Planning allows students additional time for study

Even studious college students could probably find more time to study if grades indicated the need. An investigation by a Texas A&M University student says a student who plans his time could free from 30 to 44 hours a week — without resorting to "burning the midnight oil."

That's for the better-than-average student. An average student might need to find more.

The times were obtained from interviews with 49 students and analysis by Mary Campbell for an undergraduate course. "My sample was not very big," she admitted.

The sophomore from Hurst interviewed engineering and veterinary medicine students with another hypothesis in mind. She planned to compare their study times.

A professor noted that Campbell would be comparing apples and oranges," since she interviewed professional programs in veterinary medicine and engineering undergraduates. He said the vet students' study habits would be more appropriately compared to engineering graduate students, or engineering undergraduates to pre-vet.

Campbell obtained a 28-hours-a-week study average from engineering majors. Vet students estimated less, but spend significantly more time in classes and labs.

Combining 28 hours studying, 20 hours in class, a 20-hour part-time job and eight hours a night sleep leaves 44 "free" hours each week. Even including time for dining, housekeeping chores and recreation should leave some extra hours.

Engineering students interviewed by Campbell estimated weekly study time from six to 50 hours. A senior petroleum engineering major made the latter estimate, but even he has 27 free hours.
