O'Brien said. "We have to turn people away."

The young audiences seem to be attracted to O'Brien's off-the-wall style. O'Brien said, however, he does not gear the show for a particular type of audience.

"You have to do what you like, and if that appeals to young people — then good," he said. "If you try and gear something to an audience, you can get kind of condescending. You know, 'This is for all of you youngsters out there,' and 'I hope all of you young people are enjoying the show.

"We just try and do a show with a lot of comedy and we try be pretty innovative with the comedy. I like to be on shows that are trying to go in a new direction."

-Conan O'Brien

"We just try and do a show with a lot of comedy and we try be pretty innovative with the comedy. I like to be on shows that are trying to go in a new direction." -Conan O'Brien

O'Brien does appeal to older viewers as well.

"I have old people come up to me in the street who are up late at night who say they like the show just because it's silly or whatever," O'Brien said.

Some people wonder where the sidekick character, Andy, on the show is an old friend of O'Brien's. Although at times it seems they are good friends, O'Brien said they met only a couple of months before the show began.

"I met him when I was looking for people to work on the show," he said. "We get along really well, but we aren't old friends that went to high school together."

Despite the recent demise of another late-night rival, Arsenio Hall, O'Brien said he did not know if he had "made it."

"TV's changing so fast, I have no idea," O'Brien said. "I won't never try and predict what's going to happen next."
