275 Journalists Attend Annual A&M Workshop

Dinner, Dance Closes Activities

A buffet supper and a dance tonight will bring to a close this year's High School Workshop for more than 275 young Texas journalists.

The annual workshop sponsored by the Texas A&M Journalism Department began Monday. Students begin returning home Friday morning.

Dr. Delbert McGuire, workshop director and A&M Journalism Department head, said that student journalists spend half their time in lecture sessions and half practicing the theories in laboratories. Miss Diane Dunlop, a student at Richfield High School in Waco, was chosen Tuesday night from fifteen semi-finalists as "Miss Workshopper." She was crowned by McGuire and presented a bouquet of roses.

The four runners-up for the title were: Miss Lynn Hale of Dallas; Miss Cheryl Kay Westphal of Menard; Miss Diane Rogers of Richardson; and Miss Pam Cain of Quitman.

Rogers of Richardson; and Miss Pam Cain of Quitman.

At the request of advisors and students, the number of speakers was reduced to allow students "more time for actual practice," according to McGuire.

The lone speaker for this year's Workshop was Professor Dave Cheavens, director of Baylor University's Journalism Department.

Speaking to Workshop students Wednesday, Cheavens said, "Journalists should seek and wield power that comes with knowledge and understanding motivated by the drive to help man as he struggles for handholds on the ladder of civilization."

Cheavens, urging the journalists to seek a college education, said, "Intellectual development is only one of the terms describing what the college experience should hold for you."

Cheavens described college as a place where future journalists face a challenge and opportunity to measure responsibility as fact finders, truth seekers, educators, stimulators, inspirers, molders of opinion, and viewers with alarm.

"Many newspapers today are rendering enormous public service in depth reporting and analysis," Cheavens remarked, "by men adequately trained, and 99 per cent of those who do the job are college trained."

The speaker said it is the journalist's job not only to report the violence and ugly spot news no matter where, but also to dig below the surface and discover a solution to problems deeply rooted in man's nature and behavior.

The Workshop is divided into divisions. These are for beginning and advanced yearbook staffs and advertising, newspaper and photography students with varying degrees of experience.

Workshoppers held interviews Wednesday with Gene Stallings, A&M Head Football Coach, and Randy Matson, A&M's world shot put champion.

Members needing further details may contact director Bob Boone or president Kurt Schember," Cain said.

City Council Drops Name Change Idea

Like the hero at the end of an old western the proposed name change of College Station rode slowly into the setting sun Monday night as the College Station City Council decided to let the issue die.

It seems that the people of College Station are more than happy with the name they have and want no part of a new one. "The views of several responsible citizens prompted me to suggest a name change," Mayor D. A. Anderson said at the meeting. "I promised to bring it up and I did. Well, we brought it up tonight and we killed it. It will get no more consideration from this council."

Anderson's statement was greeted by applause from those attending the meeting.

The idea of changing the city's name was brought up in a council meeting earlier this month and received statewide attention when The Battalion published an editorial publicizing the proposed change.

Even the University of Texas got into the act when the Texas alumni offered two end zone tickets to the Texas A&M-Texas football game to the person who picked an appropriate name for College Station.

The A&M Former Students Association then replied that since the UT-exes couldn't afford more than two end zone tickets, the Aggie-exes would do their best to help them and offer four-fifty-yard line seats for the best names.

The tickets will go unclaimed because College Station is going to remain College Station until death do it part.

Two Bands Play For MSC Dance

Two of the state's more popular bands will provide music for a "Sock Hop" Tuesday night at Texas A&M's G. Rollie White Coliseum.

"Neal Ford and the Fanatics" of Houston will alternate with the "Chessmen" of Dallas to provide continuous music for the 8 to 12 p.m. dance, announced David Wilkes, chairman of the sponsoring Memorial Student Center Directorate.

"We are appreciative to Professor Carl Tishler and the Health and Physical Education Department for allowing us to use the newly refinished coliseum floor for the dance," Wilkes commented. "Socks are a must for this dance. Bare feet will be taboo."

Wilkes said parents of students are invited and urged to watch and listen from the grandstands of the recently air-conditioned coliseum.

Special Issue Out Next Week

Next week's issue of The Battalion will be the "Freshman Edition."

This special edition will contain two extra sections.

One will be a freshman orientation section, explaining some of the traditions of Texas A&M.

The other will be an Aggie fall football preview. Pictures of key players and season forecasts will be presented in this section.

The "Freshman Edition" is published annually. A copy is sent to each freshman indicating he will attend A&M this fall.
