

Freshmen Learn Much In One Year

"FISH" AWAIT THE END OF A FOOTBALL GAME WHILE "WILDCATTING."

Last year, almost one-third of the A&M enrollment was made-up of the Corps of Cadets. These students, by choice, decided to enter a new kind of life—a military life.

Those who decide to be members of the Corps will have new duties and responsibilities placed upon their shoulders, and the way they carry these responsibilities will be a measure of the success which they attain in their college life.

There will be adjustments to be made and situations to be met, but these too will strengthen their moral fiber.

The cadet's academic subjects are of prime importance. When a cadet comes to A&M, he is no longer a high school boy, but a man. He will be treated as a man by his professors and his fellow Aggies and he will be expected to conduct himself as such. His academic work will not be forced upon him, nor will it be fed to him in teaspoon doses; he will find there is ample opportunity to understand when he realizes the responsibility for success or failure lies with himself.

Upperclassmen will also treat him as a man. They will not take advantage of their authority. The "fish" will wonder at first why he is denied privileges accorded to his upperclassmen, but the reasons for this will become apparent to him as his stay continues.

"Rank hath its privileges" is an old military saying that applies to life anywhere. With increased service and rank come responsibilities and privileges.

The converse of that military saying is "Rank hath its responsibilities." As freshman passes upward through the classes, not only will privileges add dignity and prestige to his position, but likewise he will have broader responsibilities.

By being a cadet, a freshman enters into the spirit of the school. Just as elsewhere in life, a cadet will get out of his freshman year proportionately as he contributes. The best freshmen make the best upperclassmen, because they have entered wholeheartedly into becoming an Aggie. The saying is "By his freshman year ye know him"—so the cadet must strive to make his first a good year and the others will follow naturally.

The cadet's attitude toward his officers is important. They will expect the utmost respect while having him perform his duties. Their remarks and corrections are not personal, but are intended to make the freshman a better Aggie.

No cadet officer is authorized to ask a cadet to do anything of an immoral, vulgar or of degrading nature. If one violates this principle or gives an order for proper duty in profane, vulgar or vulgar language, the Corps does not expect a cadet to comply.

When a cadet has a problem he can go to his upperclassman, because they can and will help him, whether his problem is academic or others.

Statement of Purpose for the Campus Ministry at Texas A&M University

Texas A&M University is concerned with the total development of its students. The encouragement of spiritual growth is highly important in this program of total development for those who come here seeking an education.

There are many faiths represented among the students, faculty and staff member who comprise the University community. Our campus ministry is called upon to stimulate spiritual growth among the members of the University community as they search for more meaningful direction in their lives, according to their particular faiths. This task is accomplished through various types of worship, programming, and personal counseling, which we know as the campus ministry.

In a spirit of close harmony, the campus ministry assists the University in its educational program by helping members of the various faiths represented to become more sensitive to their responsibilities in the economic, political and social world. In so doing, the campus ministry performs the vital duty of demonstrating the close relationship between religious faith and worthy citizenship.

A program such as this requires continuous communication between the various faiths represented and the University. Effective communication assures each student the opportunity to hold fast to his faith while studying here, thus laying groundwork for continued spiritual growth in the years to follow.
