YAF FOUNDED

of the local chapters are in the hands of the members, not a small power group. He said that any resolution sent to the national office of YAF in Washington, D. C. must be unanimously approved by the local chapter or it is not adopted.

Jones explained the YAF positions on national issues of interest to students.

"We very definitely oppose the existing draft laws," he commented. Jones said YAF favors a professional military that could compete with industry for top graduates. He said the arrangement of the government with the legislature controlling appropriations would prevent the military coup feared by many who oppose a professional military.

He also said YAF opposes certain types of forced integration and the federal open housing laws as they were passed to aid in the civil rights movement.

Jones commented on the administration policy not to allow political organizations on the A&M campus. He said he did not want campus recognition of the local YAF chapter.

"YAF, I'll admit, represents one corner of the political spectrum. The student may find out too late that it's not what he wanted," he said.

Jones said that on some campuses new students are bombarded at registration by different political organizations and the newcomers do not know which group to choose.

"I don't want a person to come to YAF and then feel he has been fooled or duped. I want interested students to come to us; that way they'll come because they want to," he emphasized.

The conservative YAF, founded in 1960 has received the endorsement of several national figures, including U. S. senators and representatives.

The national advisory board includes Sen. John Tower of Texas, Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona, Gov. Ronald Reagan of California, Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker and John Wayne, the actor.
