United Press International
WASHINGTON — Saying industrial nations are threatened by new oil price increases, Sen. Henry Jackson wants President Carter to impose mandatory fuel saving plans — except rationing — now, to cut consumer use and fight "price gouging."

Through price increases, the OPEC countries can force rationing on consuming nations, the Washington Democrat told reporters at the Environmental Industries Council annual meeting Wednesday.

"We're going to have rationing by price gouging on the part of certain OPEC countries. It's coming fast," he said.

Jackson said all the measures except gasoline rationing should be proposed as soon as Congress approves them.

"The only way to get (OPEC) prices down is to cut consumption," he said.

Meanwhile, Energy Secretary James Schlesinger said new increases could send the price of unaddled gasoline to $1 a gallon within a year.

Schlesinger appeared before two Senate subcommittees to continue his campaign for Carter's fourfold conservation program.

Members of the Energy Regulation subcommittee have accused the administration of mishandling long-range energy policy.

"The rationing plan represents a last resort," Schlesinger told them. He said Carter plans to use administrative powers first, to force industries toward other fuels, perhaps to use clean-air rules, and to channel use of extra natural gas freed by last year's energy law.

If mandatory conservation is required, Carter would curtail advertising lighting, reduce heating and cooling of businesses, and limit service station hours, before imposing rationing.

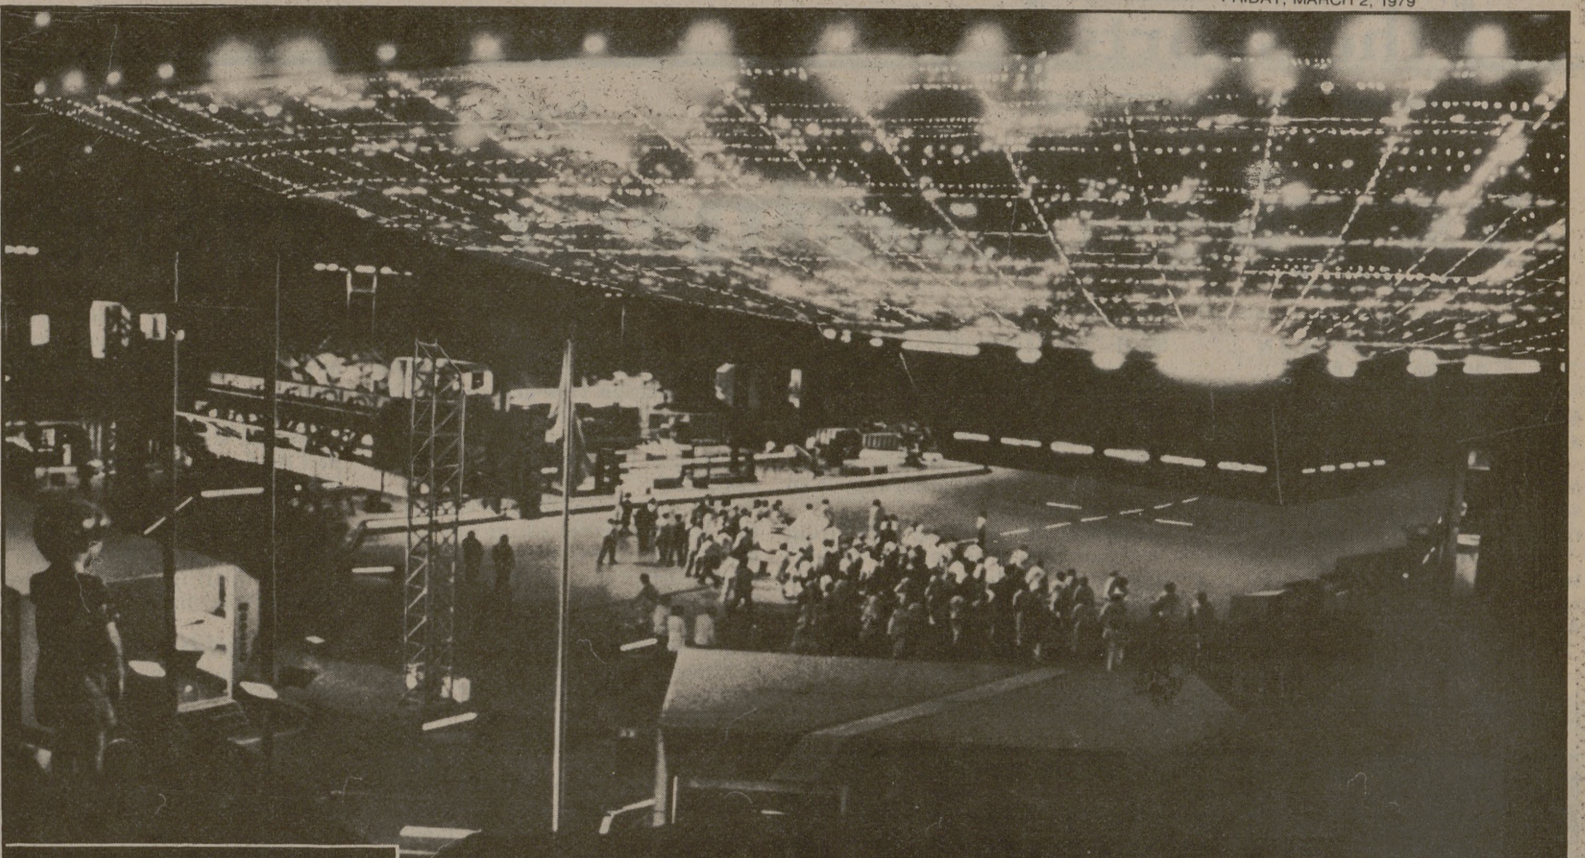

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, Ohio, asked why federal building managers had not been ordered to conserve energy to keep thermostats at 65 degrees in winter.

Waving a report on industry production, Sen. John Durkin, D-N.H., only asked, "How in God's name can you prevent the American people to make a sacrifice when you have these horrendous, unconscionable increases following oil industry profits the last quarter?"
