who it said was an active participant in the "abortion industry."

Before serving as director of the health center at Texas Women's College for the last nine years, Lekawski served as a staff physician and supervisor of the women's clinic at North Texas University as well as working in private practice.

In addition to receiving positive reaction from members of the Texas A&M community, Kibler said Lekawski was recommended by her previous employers.

"They could not say enough wonderful things about Dr. Lekawski," he said.

media was failing at its job to provide objective and accurate reports of events.

"An advocate journalist is a propagandist," Wiley said.

"They try to influence you so you will support the people and causes they support. In major TV, radio and newspapers there is advocacy journalism at every turn."

Wiley said the educational system is part of the problem of why journalists are losing their objectivity. He made the point that knowledge and experience are essential for reporters to be good at their jobs.

"Advocacy journalists cover the news so that they change the image of reality," Wiley said. "If you manipulate news, you change history."

Wiley said much of the history students are taught today is factually wrong because the media covered it wrong when it happened.

"We have a failing society," Wiley said. "Young people are not being taught things by adults. When you have an uneducated public, it makes it easier to manipulate people."

Wiley also said that society is "barred by misinformation."

Wiley said journalists should not glorify themselves. It is the journalists' job to give the public facts, not opinions.

Journalists should gain knowledge to do their job right, he said.

"We have reporters who don't know how to write or spell in some cases. Get knowledge if you're going to be a reporter or anything else," Wiley said.
