and Walton Hall each received special mention because of the high turnout from each organization.

Aggie Yell Leaders Cardo Walthall and Bo Wilson held a yell practice just before students dispersed to their assigned job sites.

Big Event has changed from past years. The biggest change this year was the increase in the number of students who participated, McAlpine said.

Big Event began in 1982 when six Aggies planned to clean a local cemetery. Big Event has always been a way for Aggies to thank the Bryan-College Station community each year, McAlpine said.

"[Big Event] is a thank you to the entire community that supports A&M, not just lower-level income areas," McAlpine said.

Students and student organizations are recruited to work on all of the community projects planned for the day. A computer program randomly assigns students and organizations to service sites.

"We will not turn anyone down unless [the service event] is an unsafe environment," said Allison Qualls, assistant director of Big Event.

McAlpine and Qualls said the entire community is grateful and thanks all the students who participated in Big Event.

Big Event has evolved into the largest single-day, student-run service project in the country. At last count, almost 40 colleges and universities across the U.S. have created their own version of Texas A&M's Big Event.

Other schools, like Oklahoma State University, learned about the event through a student government conference held each year at A&M.

Big Event is sponsored and organized by Texas A&M's Student Government Association. The students are responsible for raising the nearly $40,000 needed for Big Event and also for gathering tools and supplies needed for the various projects.

Big Event is funded on a year-to-year basis through student allocation fees as well as donations from the community, former students and Aggie Mom's Clubs.

Some goals that Big Event organizers want to fulfill are the establishment of an endowment fund, an increase in jobs and student turnout on the day of Big Event and expansion to more universities across the country.

regents. Instead, a $100 million project will create under- and overpasses, grade separations throughout town, with a minor rail relocation starting near Street in Bryan.

A&M officials have been working with the Metropolitan Planning Organization for a past year trying to create a campus by removing the tracks that there was little public support for the track relocation.

"We're disappointed that we still have this fundamental problem after this long discussion," said Dr. Ray M. Bowen, University president.

Sippial said the Metropolitan Planning Organization will investigate adding pedestrian and bicycle passageways at the crossing.

A special bus crossing would likely be too expensive. An extensive assessment of the project must be completed before construction can begin.

Board Vice Chairman Dionel E. Aviles said he is discouraged by the plan and the organization's decision.

"This is not very encouraging news, to say the least," Aviles said.

Also, regents approved plans for a $5 million, 160,000 square foot addition to the Langford Architecture Center. The A&M Architecture school was recently named number 10 in the country.

Cervantes, a junior political science major is running for Council Position 2. James Benham, a graduate student and local business owner, is running for Council Position 6.

Cruz said he will campaign to register students to vote in the coming election by setting up tables in high-traffic areas on campus.

"All we have to do is pool our votes together and fill these four positions," Cruz said. "Let's make Aggieland, Aggieland."

Benham said he is running on his own and not involved with the group campaign Cruz is leading with Flowers and Cervantes.
