

THE BATTALION

Published by the Battalion, 1884

THE BATTALION, 1884

THE BATTALION, 1884

LITERARY

Wilson's Oration as a Boy

The first oration which I ever delivered was at the age of ten years. It was a short one, and I remember it very distinctly. I was standing at a desk in the school room, and I felt very nervous. My hands were shaking, and my voice trembled. I had been given the subject of "The Duties of a Boy," and I had spent many days preparing it. I had written it out on a piece of paper, and I had read it over many times. But when I came to the school room, I forgot almost all that I had written. I only remember a few words, and I was very embarrassed. My teacher, however, was very kind and encouraging. He told me that I had done very well, and that I should be proud of my oration. He said that I had spoken clearly and distinctly, and that I had shown a great deal of interest in the subject. He said that I had done better than many of the other boys in the class, and that he was very pleased with my performance. I was very happy to hear this, and I felt that I had done my duty. I had learned a great deal from this experience, and I had become more confident in my own abilities. I had also learned that it was important to be prepared for any occasion, and that I should always try to do my best. This was the first of many orations which I delivered in my life, and it was a very important one for me. It was the beginning of my career as a public speaker, and it was a very successful one. I had learned a great deal from it, and I had become more confident in my own abilities. I had also learned that it was important to be prepared for any occasion, and that I should always try to do my best. This was the first of many orations which I delivered in my life, and it was a very important one for me.

The first oration which I ever delivered was at the age of ten years. It was a short one, and I remember it very distinctly. I was standing at a desk in the school room, and I felt very nervous. My hands were shaking, and my voice trembled. I had been given the subject of "The Duties of a Boy," and I had spent many days preparing it. I had written it out on a piece of paper, and I had read it over many times. But when I came to the school room, I forgot almost all that I had written. I only remember a few words, and I was very embarrassed. My teacher, however, was very kind and encouraging. He told me that I had done very well, and that I should be proud of my oration. He said that I had spoken clearly and distinctly, and that I had shown a great deal of interest in the subject. He said that I had done better than many of the other boys in the class, and that he was very pleased with my performance. I was very happy to hear this, and I felt that I had done my duty. I had learned a great deal from this experience, and I had become more confident in my own abilities. I had also learned that it was important to be prepared for any occasion, and that I should always try to do my best. This was the first of many orations which I delivered in my life, and it was a very important one for me. It was the beginning of my career as a public speaker, and it was a very successful one. I had learned a great deal from it, and I had become more confident in my own abilities. I had also learned that it was important to be prepared for any occasion, and that I should always try to do my best. This was the first of many orations which I delivered in my life, and it was a very important one for me.