

The article headed "To-morrow vs. To-day" is a splendid literary production; but it was written by a teacher in another college. We always thought that Austin College possessed enough talent to write its own articles for its paper and were surprised to see most of its pages filled with an article from an outsider.

We note a severe reflection made by the Polytechnian on our use of grammar. Our local editor requests us to state that he is both shocked and surprised that the "Polytechnic savants" should let their fancy carry them into such absurdities. If they had looked with "half an eye" they could have seen that it was all the fault of the Doctor. Were we not taught in the "red-back Reed & Kellogg" that participles may be used as attribute complements? In the sentence, "The Doctor speaks very flattering of the school," the use of flattering is just as plain as the use of sleeping in, "The city lies sleeping."

 CLIPPINGS.

A SLIGHT MISTAKE.

I called upon my sweetheart
 One evening rather late;
 I saw her in the distance—
 A-waiting at the gate.

She did not see me coming—
 I knew it was put on;
 I crept up close beside her
 And hugged and kissed my dear.

"Go 'way, man—stop foolin'!"
 I took another look;
 Oh! horrors upon horrors!
 It was the colored cook!
