Flirting is Justifiable.

(Rubbish)

It is exceedingly strange that in this fast age a cry should rise against a custom that has been honored by the most civilized nations of the globe and only ceases to infuse itself into the relations between the two sexes as we approach the boundaries of barbarism or semi-civilization. It is the vivifying principle that enlivens the gait and blandishments of polite society. It is the mirthful leaven that gives life to all the public social entertainments of our enlightened age. It shines like a star of the first magnitude in the brilliant constellation of charms that lovely woman displays for the pleas-
