LITERARY.

An Adventure With a Mummy.

W. A. H.

IT WAS a cold rainy evening when Warren Sheffield opened the door of his room and entered. The apartment was well furnished, and with that taste, which to the casual eye of an observer, bespoke a certain refinement and care that is unusual among the students of King College. On the walls were arranged various athletic trophies, such as flags and pennants, and above the mantel two fencing foils were crossed over a bag containing a pair of boxing gloves; and on the other side of the room in a vacant corner, dumb bells and Indian clubs hung from a rack. Indeed, this would seem to be the home of some enthusiastic athlete, and to look at the owner, one's suspicions might be verified. Tall, well knit, with broad shoulders and deep chest, Sheffield looked every inch the crack athlete that he was; and even today the un-
