

The volume, while small, was well edited and a credit to its promoters. On account of insufficient support, however, the enterprise was dropped until last year, when the class of 1903, with commendable patriotism and zeal, sent out volume No. 2 of the Long Horn. This book, bound in College colors, tastefully illustrated, edited with care, and of sufficient size to worthily represent the institution, met with such favor that the class of 1904, encouraged by the support of the faculty and alumni, has unanimously agreed to do its part towards perpetuating the publication. A supervising board of editors, chosen from the upper classes, has already been elected. They propose to surpass all previous efforts, and will devote especial attention to the artistic and humorous features that make such a book a treasured memento of college days. The 1904 Long Horn will be a handsomely bound volume of not less than two hundred pages, illustrated by photographs and drawings, and will cost more than one hundred dollars. The Long Horn is a picture of the Agricultural & Mechanical College as seen through the students' eyes—and they make faithful photographers. It is their translation of the drama of college days, told through the medium of pictures, jokes, caricatures, stories and biographies (there will be no essays or long speeches). Every phase of campus life will receive attention. Pictures and biographies of the entire faculty and official boards will be printed, and perhaps a few gentle, yet searching jokes will be made at their expense. Photographs of all the buildings,
