Many struggling American artists are indebted to Countess Gladys Vanderbilt Szecsenyi for timely help in distant lands. Perhaps no case better illustrates her thoughtful and kindly spirit in aiding her compatriots than my own. After completing my studies with Prof. Hubay, on giving my debut concert, the Countess enlisted the vital interest of all the members of the Ministry, diplomacy and aristocracy in the first American violinist to concertise in Budapest. Just as I was about to step upon the platform to open my program, her cable from London was handed to me, reading:

"I am certain of your artistic success. Allow me to assure the financial success with one thousand crowns."

Her absolute faith in my ability, coupled with the responsibility of being the pioneer for the American artist performing in Budapest, gave me such great stimulus that I surpassed myself beyond my wildest expectations that night. My interpretations of the Hungarian and Slavic compositions in particular won great ovations from my elite audience, and it was that very occasion which decided my chosen life work. The wonderful possibilities for individual interpretation in these powerful compositions make them a fascinating life study for me.

The above incident is only one among many recorded to the Countess' credit. Countess Szecsenyi has established a prestige in Hungary for the American woman that will be remembered long after the Vanderbilt millions have ceased to cause a furore in the land of Magyars.

THE GOLF LINKS.

For several weeks past an epidemic fever has been spreading slowly, but ever increasingly, throughout the college. There is a peculiar characteristic of the epidemic that individualizes it from any other, namely, that it has precipitated itself only on the instructional staff and their appendages. The classical name for this malady is "golf;" but the provincial name is "cow-pasture pool."

Credit is to be given to the few members of the faculty who planned and put into existence in such short time this novel way to passing time that would otherwise be a burden. This aspect of the game does it no way give it justice. Its chief function is to some, pleasure, to a few, recreation, and to others, exercise.

The links have been laid out under the personal supervision of a golf expert, and the excellent ones of Chicago have been duplicated as nearly as possible in the college links. In some unique ways the course here outclasses the former. The many natural hazards and the remarkable speed of some of the greens make the score of each hole uncertain to the very brink of the cup.

Prof. Chastain (placing his hand on Woody's head)—I can tell by this boy's bumps in what state he was born.

Woody—In what state, professor?

Prof. Chastain—In the state of ignorance.

Mr. Bechert—Hemphill, what sort of tooth curves have involute gear teeth?

Hemphill—Hyperbolic and parabolic, I think.
