REVEILLE.

It's dawn on a winter morning,
Dawn with a streak of gray;
With me asleep in the blankets,
Dreaming my time away;
Snuggled under the white top
Just as the gray mist clears,
Dreaming of other mornings
Back through a thousand years.
And then with a call that echoes.
Drear as the funeral drum,
Cutting my heart to ribbons—
The Reveille says, "Come."

It's dawn on a winter morning,
With a red streak through the trees
With me asleep in the blankets,
Dreaming of peace and ease;
Dreaming of days behind me,
Far from the khaki'd brave,
Far from a stove unlighted
And a tent as cold as the grave.
And then with a blare that tosses
Its woes to the winter skies,
Tearing my soul to pieces—
The Reveille says, "Rise!"

The guns of the Huns are one thing,
Part of the big day's job;
The big shells are another,
Bringing their thrill or throb;
Life in a dugout's nothing
To bring on a ringing cheer,
But give me the big shells crashing
Give me the big guns to hear—
Give me the Huns' worst answer,
Give me the charging drum
When out of the cold dawn's shadows
The Reveille says, "Come!"
