DUSK

Fading brightness in the West, Tangled branches of silhouetted tree-tops reach upward...spreading
...grasping,

Peaked roofs: chimneys—sifting their thin Indian-like wisps of smoke
through the half light;

Pale lights struggling—anxious for darkness—giving them power.

Feathered choristers gathering
...noisily waiting...flitting...
feeling safe in their numbers.

Darkness blankets the West.

Tangled branches of tree-tops blend with the darkness and vanish

Peaked roofs: chimneys...no longer discernable—assuring aroma
—Ah! The unseen smoke still sifts upward.

Lights glittering; brighter now
...haughty with power in the darkness.

Feathers ruffled—wings folded —resting...awaiting the morrow.

Darkness has fallen;

But the calmness of dusk still lingers.

WESTINGHOUSE PRESENTS
FORD WITH EXHIBIT

The great Ford Museum at Dearborn, Michigan, will represent every phase of American industrial, agricultural and domestic life. The accumulation of exhibits is already vast and, when complete, will represent a vivid and authentic record of American progress.

When Henry Ford visited the East Pittsburgh works of the Westinghouse Electric Company, recently, he was presented with the most complete exhibit of pioneer electrical inventions in existence. This entire collection will be placed in the Ford Museum as a permanent industrial exhibit.

Approximately 600 different articles comprise the exhibit, most of them being important inventions of the "gay eighties and nineties." Although containing historical pieces of direct current machinery, this collection is almost entirely an exhibition of the development of a. c. machinery. It is appropriate that Westinghouse should contribute largely to this phase of electrical development since George Westinghouse, the founder of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company was the first man to introduce alternating current in this country.
