"Girls About Town," is a sprightly, saucy, romantic drama. Kay Francis and Lilyan Tashman are sophisticated young gold-diggers who work for Allan Dinehart, a big business man. When visiting Babbitts come to town, Lilyan and Kay put them in the right frame of mind so that Dinehart can effect profitable business deals from them. Thus Eugene Pallette and Joel McCrea arrive in town, and become prospective victims. But things don't turn out as one would expect for such charming gold-diggers, for they fall in love, marry their victims, and make their gold-digging lawful. In addition to a good cost in a good story, you will see the two best dressed women on the screen, in the latest.

A novel mystery thriller with a good cast, comes, in "Guilty Hands," with Lionel Barrymore, Kay Francis, and C. Aubrey Smith. The story is something new in mysteries, and with such a cast, should be a relief from the old type.

"The Beloved Bachelor," is a beautiful heart interest story, featuring the love of an artist. The plot is interesting, and carried well by an excellent cast. Paul Lukas, Dorothy Jordan, and Charles Ruggles play the leads. As a great lover, Lukas does not know with whom he is in love, until he realizes that a young lady he had raised from babyhood has his heart strings, but it is almost too late. Ruggles does well in supplying the comedy.

And now for another stage show on the screen, "Flying High." Taken from George White's Broadway comedy hit, and led by Bert Lahr, star of the original stage success, it is a real comedy. With Lahr, the new screen comedian, is Charlotte Greenwood, the longest laugh in pictures, and Pat O'Brien, Broadway favorite. You shouldn't be disappointed in this humorous story of the air ways.

Again appears that beloved screen pair, Charles Farrell and Janet Gaynor, in a story of the heart, "Merely Mary Ann." Mary Ann is a poor orphan servant in a boarding house, who works her way into the heart of a young composer, whom she inspires to success. A beautiful romance, in Farrell-Gaynor style.

Harvard-Oxford Debate Likely To Be Held By Radio

(Intercollegiate Press) New York, Nov. 3.—Tentative plans of the National Broadcasting Company call for an international debate by radio between Harvard and Oxford Universities some time in the first week of December.

The argument, between the two famous schools 3,000 miles apart and separated by the Atlantic Ocean, will be rebroadcast in this country to the national hookup of the NBC, and it is probable that the British Broadcasting Company will do the same in England.

The event, the first of its kind ever to be held, will also be the first debate between Harvard and Oxford since 1925.

Beans Pay Land-Lord For Three Months At Tech

(College News Service) Lubbock, Tex., Nov. 3.—When the Texas Technological College opened its doors for registration this fall, Herbert D. Bell solved an economic problem in a manner creditable to a student of business administration.

The potential engineer whipped out a "slip-stick" and after several swift calculations induced and over-awed a landlord to accept a truck load of beans in lieu of three months rent.

A race of super men, intellectually, is about to be called for in the world, Dr. John Grier Hibben, president of Princeton University, told his students recently.

Remains Of Pre-Historic Animal Found In Texas

(Intercollegiate Press) Ann Arbor, Mich., Nov. 3.—The Museum of Paleontology of the University of Michigan has announced discovery of the dorsal armor of a giant phytosaur of the Triassic Age.

The discovery was made near Amarillo, Texas, by an expedition composed of Dr. E. C. Case, director of the museum, and several aids. Dr. Case describes phytosaurs as large carnivorous reptiles, like crocodiles in form and habits. The specimen was part of the skeleton of an animal about 25 feet long which lurked in the swamps some 50,000,000 years ago.

The phytosaur's back was covered by an armor made up of thick bony plates, and the Michigan expedition made the first find of a set of the armor plates in undisturbed position.

College Co-ed Is Now A Princess

(Intercollegiate Press) Evanston, Ill.—An Evanston girl former co-ed at Northwestern University, may some time sit on the throne of Abyssinia. She is Dorothy Hadley, 25, whose marriage a year ago to Prince Malaku Bayen has just been made public. The prince is a nephew of Tsail Selassie I, Abyssinian king who claims descent from Solomon.

The couple met in Washington where Miss Hadley was a registrar at Howard University. They eloped to Fairfax, Va., and were married. The prince is a medical student at Howard, and the royal pair live near the campus.

Co-eds Rejoice To Learn The Dean Of Women Pitched Hay

(College News Service) Walla Walla, Wash., Nov. 3.—Recalcitrant co-eds at Whitman college engaged in mental retrenchment this week following the revelation that Miss Thelma Mills, dean of women, spent the summer pitching hay on a farm near Forest Hills, Oregon.

Murmurs among the bobbed heads were to the effect that house rules, lockout rules and other sometimes troublesome regulations were fairly safe from infraction after all.

Miss Mills, however, smilingly declined to admit that she visioned anything but hay at the receiving end of the fork when she vigorously swung the tines.
