Musical Meanderings

By Murray Evans

Kay Kyser recently took his band to New York and left Ginny Simms on the west coast, there by terminating one of the most beloved associations in the music world. Ginny is being groomed for starring roles in forthcoming RKO productions.

To fill Ginny's place, or try to at least, Kyser has hired two attractive bits of femininity to handle the vocals. One of them is a tall, striking brunette called Dorothy Dunn, and the other is a reverse type, a cute, co-eddish blonde answering to Trudy Erwin. One of Kay's best records of late is "After Tomorrow."

Max Henry, Aggie's ace drummer, does a nice job of hide-beating on "A Man And His Drums." That number runs strongly to drums anyway, with just enough melody interspersed to prevent too much of a good thing in the way of drum over-dosage. Entirely surrounded by his pots and pans, Max goes to work in earnest on the breaks, and before the last bar is reached, has worked himself to a frenzy and frazzle at the same time. But it leaves

Murder Barometer Rises, Business Booms

Finding the lust to kill most rampant during boom years, a criminologist concludes the "murder barometer" is due to rise with business indices.

"We found 494 murders were committed in the boom years of 1925-29—only 53 less than the total for the 10-year depression period from 1930 through 1939," he reports.

Lunden doesn't maintain his figures are indicative of a national trend, but statistics compiled by other crime scientists in other sections of the nation also have shown more murders during boom years.
