English Sailors Visit Campus While on Leave from Vessels

Monday two sailors from His Majesty's Royal Navy of Britain were on the campus spending part of their furlough inland just for a change of scenery. They were Seamen Frank Pearson and Leslie Hardware, both of Yorkshire (the town that made the pudding famous) England.

One thing noticeable was the fact that neither said anything without first thinking it over very carefully. Said the one, "If we were to accidentally make a statement which contained even the faintest trace of information, the Admiralty would be furious."

When the two met Lord Halifax in Houston last week end, he asked them how long they would be here. Frank evaded the question by answering, "I really don't know, sir." Halifax came back with, "Good, I don't want to know, you don't want to know, and don't partment, inspired by the torrential floods of last week. By the author's admission, the composition is worse than worthless, but is presented as a sort of oddity—or wonder. Originally spaced into surrealistic poetry, the "thing" has been ran together into one long stanza, further adding to its value as "stranger than fiction." After this printing, it will rest in the college Museum, except when it is loaned out to the State Insane Asylum:

RAIN

Rain is a combination of water and thunder. When it does, you can't stop it, and when it doesn't, you want it to. April is like July without it and July is like April with it—when April isn't like July. Rain makes you want to sleep, even when you have to study, which you should, even if you can't go any place—that is, if you know it is raining. Rain is very dangerous on account because some people don't have enough sense to stay out of it, but that is probably because they don't know it's raining anyway. I like rain better than any other kind of wet weather because it makes me do things I wouldn't if it didn't, which is a very good influence. What do you think tell anybody!"

Seaman Hardware formerly sailed on one of the 50 American destroyers which the United States gave to England. Seaman Pearson has just recently come out of China where he was stationed.

Pearson was somewhat surprised when visiting on an American battleship to have hot coffee served to him in one of the gun turrets when the gunner pushed a buzzer. On the British ships the crews prepare their own meals, instead of having ship's cooks who attend to all mess duties.

Both seemed apologetic that they could not talk more about their experiences in the war. Leslie said in his friendly British accent that he has some hair raising tales to tell, and as soon as the war is over he plans to combine them all into a book.

hand, and left to himself. He has proved his worth by keeping the number of prairie dogs down to a comfortable figure. These picturesque, but harmful animals have caused the death of many a fine cow pony who unknowingly have stepped into one of their burrows, and subsequently had to be shot.

Some beneficial aspects of these snakes may seem far-fetched and trivial, but why go out of our way to kill a snake because we personally have received no benefit through our connection with snake-dome? Even though snakes carry poison they do not go out of their way to use it; primarily it is used for procuring food, and secondarily for self-defense—not for malicious attacks.

Medicine finds many uses for snake venom—haemophilia, a disease characterized by the failure of an individual's blood to clot, can be readily controlled by injections of Cotton-Mouth Water Moccasin venom. Cobra poison has been used in nervous ailments, and it has even been shown that rattlesnake bites have actually cured epilepsy!

Gradually we have seen the lowly snake raised to a niche in life where it becomes an aid in allaying human suffering and even death. Snakes were created for a definite purpose it seems; let us not kill them unwantonly.
