BRIENT

later, the little boys just got up and walked out—dead tired their first real "engagement."

After that little orchestra broke up, Russel took his bass into various other school and local bands, and in 1939 brought it with him when he came to Aggeland.

He tried out for the bass spot the first years here, but because the band already had someone who seemed good enough, Curley didn't make the grade. Then last year, 1941-42 Aggeland Maestro Toppie Pierce needed a bass. Curley was there faster than Toppie could hit low C, and he filled the spot like it had never been filled before.

When the 1942 season rolled around, and the Aggeland had to elect a new leader to replace Pierce, there just seemed no other choice than to make energetic Curley the boss—and so they did.

The Aggeland orchestra is a cooperative band, with each member counting just as much as anyone else. Although its members are from all four classes on the Aggie campus, the leader is usually a senior, and is picked not only for his musical ability, but also for his talent in handling publicity, smiling at the ladies in front of the bandstand, and getting the best out of a business deal.

Brient really fills the bill. Hard-working, energetic, and progressive, he is forever grateful for criticism and suggestions from his friends and followers about improving the band, and he has a great big, sunny grin backed up by a shining disposition to help him on his way to success.

When asked about leading a band as a profession, he said, "Sure, I want a band, but right now we are going to school learning to be officers in the United States Army. When the war is over, and our job is done, I hope to come back down here and organize me a band, and I hope when I do that I can get together as well a bunch of fellows as I have now."

his civilian clothes and will be in the uniform that they will wear for two years and eight months of intensive college and military study.

Throughout the balance of the week college authorities will assist the new students in outlining courses of study, instruct them in use of library and other study facilities, and the military department will start giving them the training that many entitle them to commissions in the army when they have completed their course of study.

It is hoped the new indoctrination program will prevent the usual number of scholastic deficiencies, and will materially aid the new students in bridging the gap between high school and college life, stated the president's assistant.

Lt. Isbell First Aggie Fighter Over Dieppe French Soil

Lt. James A. Isbell, U. S. Army Air Corps, formerly in B Company Infantry, was the first Aggie to fight over France with the American Expeditionary Forces in World War II. Lt. Isbell was part of the air force covering the Allied Commando raid on Dieppe, France August 9.

He was at A. & M. from the fall of 1937 until the spring of 1940. In a letter to Jack Simmons, Quartermaster Corps, Isbell said the Aggies "beat the Germans that day fair and square, but the Germans are exceptionally good flyers." He went on to say that he had never seen as many planes at one time as there were over the skies of Dieppe that day, and that the English people were "very nice", especially to the American soldiers, sailors, and marines.

"I learned more in that one day of fighting than I ever learned in the Air Corps," concluded Lt. Isbell.
