Sodium Light For Detecting Flaws

Sodium light, which has proved so effective in the prevention of night traffic acidents, is being used in several important war plants for surface inspection by microscope, because of its efficiency in the detection of pits, cracks, and flaws in materials. The sodium lamp is essentially an arc lamp, and differs from the incandescent lamp.

where maximum eve sensitivity occurs. A given amount of energy from sodium light produces several times as much illumination as the same amount of energy in white light."

As in the case of sodium lighting for night safety driving, monochromatic light for miscroscopic inspection is most effective when spread uniformly over a large era rather than concentrated in small bright patches. In this way an undistorted view of both size and shape of flaws present is obtained. For most effective results, the legel of the illumination should be compartively high, especially when the contrast between flaw and surrounding material is low. It is helpful in searching for cracks and blow holes to treat the part with either a light-absorbing or light-reflecting dye, the dye depending on the nature of the surface to be inspected. The dyed surface should be cleaned thoroughly before inspection. This procedure increases to contrast between flaw and object to the point where many times smaller flaws can be detected. In all cases it has been found necessary to block out as much sunlight as possible, in order not to destroy the monochromatic nature of the sodium illumination.
