

Vitamin C Protects Army From Scurvy

To prevent scurvy in the armed forces "where men are isolated from fresh food supplies," synthetic vitamin V is very useful, Dr. Charles G. King, Scarsdale, N. Y., scientific director of the Nutrition Foundation, Inc., New York, declared in a General Electric Science Forum address here. "A pound of the pure crystals, if taken in small, regular dosages, would last a person half a lifetime," said Dr. King, who also is visiting professor of chemistry at Columbia University.

"The armed forces now use large quantities of the pure vitamin to blend with dried lemon flavor and sugar," he explained. "Every soldier in the field can add a small bit of the powder from his lunch packet to a cup of water, and thus have a drink of lemonade, with confidence that the vitamin C is there."

"Since the dawn of history, man has discovered over and over again that there is something in fresh food that is necessary for the preservation of health and physical strength," he added, pointing out that Napoleon's disastrous campaign in Russia collapsed in part because his troops were weakened by the onset of scurvy. Dr. King also mentioned it has been estimated "that up to the time of World War I, more men had been lost at sea from scurvy than from all the losses in naval warfare."

"When Rear Admiral Byrd made his last trip to the Antarctic, a small package of pure, crystalline vitamin C gave his crew full assurance against scurvy," he said. This form of the vitamin is now isolated from lemon juice and from corn sugar in abundance.

New Method Found To Control Liver Fluke

A means for controlling liver fluke, which long took a heavy toll in market weight of cattle raised in the Texas Gulf Coast area, has been found. Processors have estimated that the liver fluke cut 20 pounds off the meat yield of an infected steer. The source of the disease was small, flat, leaf-shaped parasites which sought the liver for attack and were difficult to reach by the usual medications.

The USDA, a publication of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, recently printed a story about Dr. O. Wilford Olsen, who found means to bring the elusive ailment under control. Once a South Sea Island missionary, Dr. Olsen now is a scientist in the Bureau of Animal Industry with headquarters at Angleton, Texas.

USDA's story says that the drug, hexachlorethane, had been found to be effective against the parasites and safe to use, but it was difficult to administer because of its insolubility in water. Through experimentation, however, Dr. Olsen found that betonite, a claylike substance, combined well with hexachlorethane to make a smooth emulsion which was easy to give as a drench.

The chemical lore associated with the preparation seemed hard to explain to practical Texas cowmen, but Dr. Olsen had been interpreter to the king of a South Sea island. He had also translated religious books into the native languages. Degrees from three United States universities provided further scientific and literary background as did also teaching experience at the University of Hawaii. As a result of this colorful training, Dr. Olsen began to tell the Texas stockmen how they could wage a winning fight against the cunning liver fluke. He talked the stockman's language with persuasive missionary fervor and they soon began to master the scientific pattern and the practical use of the two chemicals.

When state prison officials let Dr. Olsen try out the new remedy on a part of the institution's herd, USDA's story continues, the results were so convincing that the trial proved to be a demonstration of the value of liver fluke control. The mounting demand for hexachlorethane as a chemical weapon against the parasites led to substantial commercial production and distribution.

Heavy and light cruisers are named after large cities and aircraft carriers are named after historical naval vessels or battles.

Submarines are named after fish and marine creatures and minesweepers and submarine rescue vessels are named after birds.

Gunboats are named after small cities, river gunboats are named after islands and submarine tenders are named after pioneers in submarine development.
