The Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas has been selected as the site of a new United States Army Ordnance Gauge Laboratory, it was announced in a letter today to J. T. L. McNew, vice president for engineering, from Col. Clyde H. Morgan, chief of the St. Louis Ordnance District.

The laboratory, completely air conditioned and housing a complete assortment of fine precision measuring equipment and gauges, will be available for use in student instruction in all classes in the shops and laboratories of the college, and for use in experimental and research work. It likewise will be in stand-by readiness for use by the government for checking field gauges and for instruction of Ordnance Reserve officers. Should a national emergency arise, the U. S. Army Ordnance Department will assume operation of the laboratory in control of production of vital supplies.

Colonel Morgan in commenting on the establishment of the laboratory at Texas A. & M. College stated: "I feel that the presence of the laboratory at the college will do much to keep industry in this area precision minded, and it is my desire to make this laboratory the finest in the country."

Equipment for the gauge laboratory has been arriving at College Station for several weeks from war plants and army ordnance districts throughout the country.

The laboratory will be housed adjacent to the shops of the college's mechanical engineering department. These shops are in process of being extensively expanded with production machinery secured from government surplus stocks, and will provide the most modern and complete training to young men who seek their education at A. & M., Mr. McNew said.
