Man, Your Manners

By I. Sherwood

You have an excellent highway technique but do be careful not to impose on the hospitality offered you. When a driver offers you the hospitality of his car, don't detain him too long while you make-up-your-mind whether you will accept his offer of a ride. Go as far as Hearne, if that is your direction, too. Don't keep him waiting then tell him no one wants to go with him—he may not even stop to offer you a ride next time.

On short trips, it is most inconsiderate to ask a friend, who has given you a lift, to stop here and there while you do some errands, nor should you, if you are a guest in a car, suggest stopping for refreshments unless you expect to pay for them. Even then, it may be embarrassing to your host or hostess.

Passengers in another's car should respect its interior. Ask permission to smoke and be sure to put cigarette ashes in the receiver. Don't open or close the windows of a guest car without permission.

Good car manners are as important as any other nice manners you may have.

woman, with light brown hair, only faintly streaked with gray and skinned back into a tight knot, clear blue eyes, a creamy skin, a straight delicate nose, fine even white teeth, and a small rounded chin. From this dainty pretty head cascaded a series of busts and stomachs which made her look like a cooky jar shaped like a woman. Mrs. Kettle's language was no more refined than were her physical features, she said what she thought at any time and at any place.

The description of Mr. Kettle is as vivid as that of Mrs. Kettle. He had a thick thatch of stiff gray hair quite obviously cut at home with a bowl, perched on top of which he wore a black derby hat. His eyebrows grew together over his large red nose and spurted out threateningly over his deepest bright blue eyes. He had a tremendous flowing mustache generously dotted with crumbs, a neck-line featuring several layers of dirty underwear, and sweaters, and bib overalls tucked into the black rubber hip boots. Mr. Kettle lisped, and he was a perpetual borrower. The author states that the flour, chicken feed, eggs, bacon, coffee, butter, cheese, sugar, salt, hay and kerosene which the Kettles borrowed from them if placed end to end would have reached from there to Kansas City.

The Hicks were the very opposite of the Kettles their farm was five miles down the road in the opposite direction from the Kettles. Mrs. Hicks was stiffly starched and immaculate from the moment she arose in the morning until she went to bed, looked like she had been left in the washing machine too long, and wore dippy waves low on her forehead. The Hicks had a neat white house, a neat white barn, and neat white chicken house, pig pen, and brooder house, and all surrounded by a white picket fence.

Betty MacDonald says that she learned to hate even the baby chicks. The tasks of measuring feed, washing water fountains, removing the dying chickens to the first-aid corner were always laborious to her, but seemingly a pleasure to Bob. In her Death and Food Record book she would write "Chickenpox-Eggzema and Suicide" opposite each death. Bob would see her notes and he would erase them and substitute the words, cause of death "not determined."
