KNOW YOUR ARCHITECTURE?

(This is the first of a series to be presented by the A. & M. Architecture Society with the purpose of giving information on pertinent aspects of functional design in 1946. Watch for later articles on such subjects as "Why a Flat Roof?", "Solar Heating" and other.)

How about that house you want to build?

The prime consideration when you start planning your house should be whether or not the house will conform to your activities, that is, "function" according to your everyday habits. Relatively few families live in the same manner—one family may enjoy entertaining, the other may live in comparative quietness. Their homes should be planned accordingly. The house must also be planned to conform to the site and to economic conditions.

The design should not conform to any preconceived historical style even though your next door neighbor might have seen a Dutch Colonial house last week which "would be just the thing for you." You should keep foremost in your mind that it is you who will live in the house, not your next door neighbor or a Dutchman. The size and shape of the spaces making up the house should be the natural result of what it takes to satisfy the needs of the builder. The exterior of the house should form itself naturally from the interior and should not depend upon superficial ornament for appeal. Newest building materials, construction techniques, lighting and ventilation should become an integral part of the functional design of your home.

Graduating seniors will be required to take final examinations unless exempt from such tests by their class standing, that is, within the top 25 per cent and having a grade of A or B. This was revealed by Ray Perryman, assistant registrar late last week.
