

Riedel Runs School Like a Drum Major

By HANK BUNJES

Wilfred Taylor Riedel probably knows better than anyone else in these parts how to squeeze several years of school administration work into one, because he is doing just that.

In his one year as principal of the A&M Consolidated Junior High School, Riedel has brought numerous improvements to the school to rank it with the best in the state. Upon his instigation and direction the school instituted "exploratory courses", offering the students special study in such fields as music, typing, art, crafts, shop work, and others.

The junior school is now a member of the National Honor Society as a result of Riedel's endeavors. He is also planning to form a junior school newspaper. And to add to his worries, he is arranging schedules to place the sixth grade under his jurisdiction because of the crowded conditions of the grade school. Such is the busy life of the 28-year-old administrator.

Graduating from Yorktown High School in 1940, young Taylor Riedel came to A&M College as a member of the class of '44. He was a clarinet player of sorts so he joined the field artillery band of which he became drum major in his junior year. It was in the March of 1943, however, after having served as drum major for only two months, that he heard the call to arms and joined the air force upon the insistence of Uncle Sam.

Riedel had not time to pin on his newly won wings before he was shipped to England as a first lieutenant. Even then he believed in doing a lot on a short time for he completed 35 bombing missions aboard a B17 in one year. All his raids were made after the invasion and about the time of the battle of the "bulge". What could have been disaster nearly put a stop to Riedel's activities. One day the plane he was flying was hit over Germany but the fire did not break out until he had reached Belgium. It was at this point that Riedel and his crew judiciously abandoned ship. They finally made their way back to Britain.

Returns to A&M
Veteran Riedel returned to A&M in 1945 and graduated the next summer with a bachelor of science degree in industrial education. Three years later he won his master's degree.

It was just before his graduation that Riedel married a Yorktown neighbor, Mary Jo Duderstadt, a graduate of Texas U. Now he is the father of two very young but promising boys, Mark, two years of age, and David who is only one.

Riedel likes to tell this story on himself. The year he was selected drum major of the band, an order was put out by the military department suggesting that seniors not buy boots but spend the money on war bonds. The last day before entering the air force, Riedel boldly strapped on his boots and lead the band in a review. He says the official frowns he got that day conditioned him for the troubles he was to know in the service.

TISA is and What It Can Do" will be discussed. Keith Allsup will lead this discussion. Later in the morning, the convention will consider applications by colleges for membership into the TISA.

The afternoon's meeting will elect officers for the coming year and choose a meeting place for next year's convention. The Aggie delegation will seek to gain convention approval to hold next year's convention on this campus.

Should the question of negro college admittance to the TISA be presented before the convention the A&M delegation was instructed by the last meeting of the student senate to oppose it.

The A&M delegation of five student senators are instructed to oppose admittance of negro colleges into the TISA should the subject reach the floor for discussion. This instruction came at the last meeting of the student senate when the senate voted 15-9 to instruct its delegation to oppose negro college entrance into TISA.

All representatives decided at a meeting Wednesday afternoon to prepare a full report on the convention and to present that report at the next student senate meeting.

The convention will adjourn after a banquet Saturday evening in the Baylor Student Union Building.

The new Baptist Student Union center will be used for the first time formally tomorrow night for an open house to be held following the annual BSU Banquet which takes place in Sbis Hall.
