

Stops on Spot When It's Hot

When a man's rear portions get hot—or rather his truck's—he just stops, "right on the spot."
Or at least a City of College Station garbage-truck driver did that this morning, when the post-Halloween contents of his truck burst into flames in the 100 block of Park Place.
"When something like that happens, we don't look for a place to dump," the driver said. "We just stop and aim that truck bed at the sky."
The Fire Department answered the call, but returned its truck as the city employees quickly extinguished the small blaze with nearby garden hoses.

Barber's Babies Just Imagination

London, Nov. 1—(AP)—Harold Wright, a barber, said in divorce court his wife:
Twice sent him word she had given birth to twins. She hadn't. Once advised him she had triplets. She didn't.
Showed him a borrowed baby and told him it was theirs. It wasn't.
Wright said all this made his hands so shaky he was unable to shave his customers. He called it cruelty.
Judge Blanco White said no, it wasn't. He refused the decree.
Mrs. Wright acted that way, the judge held, only because she wanted to become a mother, and couldn't.

Local Architects Enter Competition

Three senior architecture students of A&M have been named to enter student competition of the Texas Society of Architects for designing a clinic building for medical doctors.
They are Harry L. Butler of Memphis, Tenn., Billy G. Langford of Mount Enterprise and William R. Lenzen of Houston.
Designs of the three students were chosen for entrance in the state contest on the basis of an elimination contest at A&M. As winners of the local contest, they were awarded $25 each to defray expenses in attending the TSA convention in Dallas Nov. 2 and 3.
Drawings will be judged in Dallas Nov. 1.
Other Texas schools to be represented in the contest are Texas Tech, Rice, University of Texas, and University of Houston.

Campus Veterinarians Offer Pets 24 Hour Medical Care

By WAYNE DAVIS

One of the few places on the campus open 24 hours a day is also one of the least-known, if most hard-working, spots in Brazos County.

Know where it is? Dr. W. V. Lumb does; so does Dr. W. W. Armistead. So do quite a few Veterinary Medicine students. In case you haven't guessed yet, the place in question is the Small Animals Clinic, at the Veterinary Hospital.

From the moment Rover—or Towser, or Foo-foo, or Champion Rendesham Majesty of Hardwicke III, for that matter—walks into the door at the east end of the Veterinary Hospital, he's in a place all his own. From the time his master drags him up to pretty, green-eyed Mrs. Wade Smith to be registered until the moment he sprints out the door again with his master in tow, he'll receive treatment, attention, and consideration fit for a king. King of beasts, that is.

Average Day

On just an average day it isn't unusual for 30 pups or kittens to be brought in for treatment, which can range anywhere from vaccination for rabies to a major operation.

But don't think that dogs and cats are the only animals brought in. The number of patients brought in is conspicuous by its variety. The staff remembers, for instance, the time a dove was brought in with an injured wing—later fixed—and the tuberculosis monkey that was nursed back to health.

You'd be surprised how well-behaved the patients are, too. Dr. Lumb, resident surgeon of the hospital, hasn't been bitten in years; the same is true for the rest of the staff. "It all depends on the breed," Dr. Lumb says. "Some breeds, such as the Chow, are naturally bad-tempered, and we take extra precautions with them. On the other hand, a setter or Shepherd is very gentle, and rarely ever bites a doctor."

Expression

You learn to judge a dog's temper by the expression on his face." While the Clinic is operated primarily to instruct students in small-animal practice, experimentation with animals is not allowed. Only Senior VM students are permitted to diagnose or treat patients, and their diagnoses and treatments must be checked by either Dr. Lumb or Dr. Armistead before actual treatment can be undertaken.

The daytime staff of the hospital consists of Drs. Lumb and Armistead, and Senior VM students assigned there. At night, two VM students are on duty, with the two resident surgeons on call at all times.

In Car Crashes

As might be expected, quite a few of the patients are animals which have been hit by cars. On the other hand, many such animals are not brought to the clinic at all, their owners seeming to consider them already done for. "Nothing could be further from the truth," Dr. Lumb says. "Of all the animals brought here that have been hit by cars, we have saved more than 95%. The truth is, if a dog lives long enough to reach the hospital the chances are that he will recover, with proper treatment."
Simply because an animal is hit by a car does not mean that he has been killed.

Geographic Society Revives Deep Sea-Serpent Stories

Washington, Nov. 1—(AP)—Maybe it's just the Halloween spirit. Anyway, the National Geographic Society nervously peeked over its shoulders yesterday, and saw sea serpents.

The society noted in a news release that Danish scientists plan to plumb the ocean depths. The ocean is more than 35,000 feet deep in some places, and nobody knows what goes on down there.

The Danes hope to find out by lowering an apparatus on a 50,000-foot steel hawser during their two-year study.

What, asks the N.G.S., if they pull up a sea serpent?

Stories Old

The society is saddened by the fact—and properly so, I think—that the sea serpent has been displaced by the flying saucer in the I-saw-it-with-my-own-eyes league.

For the sea serpent has a wonderful history.

Originally he was such a monster that he could gulp down a ship without even bothering to masticate.

Though time has reduced his proportions, he has wandered back from time to time in circumstances that have been difficult to explain.

Consider these three examples dug up by National Geographic.

In 1817, a strange creature frolicked about the harbor of Gloucester, Mass. Plenty of people saw it. Most agreed it was a serpent with a head as large as a horse.

In 1905, two British scientists, E. G. B. Meade-Waldo and Michael J. Nichol, were cruising in Brazilian waters. A turtle-like head and neck about eight feet long was poked out of the water near the ship.

Something Sank

A strange monster of similar description was reported in 1917 by a British armed merchant ship. The ship was on blockade duty in the North Sea, so it promptly fired a six-inch shell at the creature. It sank.

Several days later two German submarines in that area reported seeing what could have been the same character. They said it was blown high into the air when the subs torpedoed a passing ship.

Most scientists think sea serpent stories are bunk. None has ever been discovered, dead or alive, to give scientific proof to the stories and legends.

On the other hand, the Encyclopedia Britannica—never renowned for playing Halloween pranks—has this to say:

"... In the depths of the sea, however, there may still be gigantic creatures of which we have no knowledge; and with this possibility, remote though it may be, in the background it is unwise to deny the existence of the sea-serpent."
Happy sea-serpentine, Danes!
