ASTRP Ex's to Hold Luncheon in Austin

Co-eds Have Studied Here

girls at that time petitioned the college for admittance. A negative ruling by the Board of Directors was upheld by Judge W. C. Davis of the 55th Judicial District. He legally upheld the right of the college to refuse admission on the grounds that the girls were not "biologically adapted" to enrollment in the college or for work for which graduates were fitted.

Apparently no positive restriction of co-education here has ever existed. The college is co-educational at the present time throughout the summer-school semesters. Female attendance, however, is never very high.

Few Exceptions
At earlier periods in A&M history, a few girls have attended the school. Most of them were daughters of faculty or staff members admitted as "special students."

Since the legislative council is only a recommending body, no action on any of its findings can be taken until the legislature convenes. Until that time the council will study the report and recommendations of its research staff concerning all the aspects of the higher education question.

Another of these aspects is brought out by Charley Trimble of The Daily Texan who is currently running a series of reports on the question. In a Tuesday article he says:

"Only 51 counties, all thinly populated, are in major part further than 50 miles from a public college, either junior or senior. Nearly 95 per cent of the population of the State lives within 50 miles of a college offering a general curriculum for at least the first two years."

Possible Solution
The Dallas News article by Morehead mentions a possible solution to this problem in the Dallas-Ft. Worth area where, oddly enough, a junior college (Arlington State) located in neither city serves as the "community college."

Morehead says the researchers offer two possible plans:
• "Co-ordinating work of existing public and private colleges serving Dallas and Fort Worth."
• "Setting up a major state college at Arlington, combining it with North Texas State, now at Denton."

Were this latter solution adopted, the North Texas campus might be used for a state hospital.

Other aspects of the research report include duplication of degree offerings, of governing boards, of specialization and of other costly features within the educational system.
