

Young Students See Butterfly Display

By LEON McCLELLAN

The markings of the lower wings of the snakes' bodies, he said.

After being told about protective coloring and markings, the children wanted to know more about the most brilliant butterflies. Glick told them how explorers of the Amazon River region claimed that natives send messages with butterfly wings, even to distances of three miles when there is bright sunlight.

One young boy wanted to know why certain moths look so much like "just plain butterflies." These moths were day-flying moths, Glick answered.

You'll never be arrested for careful driving.

When asked about the largest butterflies in the world, Glick told the children that they were called "bird-butterflies" because of their large size.

The "cobra-moths" interested both groups more than any of the other specimens. These, Glick explained, fold their wings when they light on branches, and look so much like cobra snakes that the natives in India will not touch them.

Other butterflies and moths have pigmentation which fades when they are in the sun too long. This color pigmentation, he told the young audience, is a kind of fine powder spread on top of the wings.
