Who Should Command Mediterranean?

By A. M. Roberts, Jr.

A GREAT and more than pro- found question has been raised by the news of the United States' withdrawal from the Mediterranean. It is not clear whether it is a question as to whether the Mediterranean should be controlled by the United States at all, or whether it is a question as to how the United States should command it.

The whole matter of Greek and Turkish relations has been decided by the United States in recent years. The United States has been the mediator between the two countries, and has been the power that has prevented the outbreak of war between them. The United States has also been the power that has been responsible for the arrangement of the peace treaty that ended the war.

The Mediterranean is a region of the world where the United States has a vital interest. It is a region where the United States has a strategic position, and where the United States has a political position. The United States has been a leader in the Mediterranean region, and has been a leader in the international community.

The question of who should command the Mediterranean is not a question of whether the United States should command it, but a question of whether the United States should command it effectively. The United States has been a leader in the Mediterranean region, and has been a leader in the international community. The United States has been a leader in the Mediterranean region, and has been a leader in the international community.

A couple of these days, the way far, when the lifeblood of a region is threatened, a politician is free to suggest that our action would not be to commit a great many more men to battle.
