Soph Contract Quotas May Be Cut Further

Cuts in armed forces expenditures will tighten even more the already limited number of Air Force contracts for members of the sophomore class, according to Col. John A. Way, PAS&T.

"Any figures we may have mentioned before concerning category quotas are meaningless in view of this new information," Way said.

Previously, quotas were tentatively set for the four categories of AFROTC contracts.

In Category I were those physically qualified for flight training, in Category II, students in a technical field of study; Category III consisted of cadets not in a technical field and physically unqualified for flight training. Category IV was made up of veterans who could take the training but did not need to go on active duty.

All contracts applied for will be tentative until September registration, Way said. There is a possibility that even the aircrew contract quota may be cut because the Air Force is thinking of cutting its 143-group proposed strength to 113 groups.

Concerning sophomore aptitude tests, it is likely that no more will be given, Way said. No more of the series of tests have been received by the Air Force detachment here, he said, and the semester is nearly finished.
