

17,271 Persons Receive Direct Benefit From Vocational Industrial Training

A total of 17,271 persons received direct benefit from the vocational industrial training programs carried on by the Texas Engineering Extension Service for the year July 1, 1952-June 30, 1953, Vice Director E. L. Williams said today.

The programs include classes for employed adults, vocational industrial teacher education and production and distribution of instructional material. Classes were conducted in 222 towns. More than a thousand towns were represented in the classes.

Classes for employed adults were held in local communities, area or district central locations and on the A&M campus. Classes were conducted in firemen training, police training, rural electric employe training, supervisor training, water plant and sewage disposal plant operation and maintenance training.

Many Classes Throughout State
One hundred and sixty-two classes in local communities, and 139 towns were represented with an enrollment of 2,603, were held on fire prevention, instructor training, local hazards, officer conferences and operational training.

"For the first time in Texas there was organized and taught on the A&M campus schools of one month in length and strictly for municipal police officers," Williams says. "An advisory committee composed of three city managers and three chiefs of police, guided the policies of the school. Some 20 law enforcement officials from national, state and local policing agencies made up the faculty." Fourteen local classes were held in seven towns with an enrollment of 148, while three classes were conducted on the campus with 41 towns represented. The enrollment was 60.

Six full-time men conducted training programs for employes of Texas rural electric cooperatives, including the following services: Job training and safety, "hot stick" training, principles of electricity, supervisor training. Conferences were conducted by the chief instructor for special groups, as managers, office managers and cashiers. A total of 106 classes with an enrollment of 1,878, were conducted. Seventy-eight towns were represented.

Smaller Industries Emphasized
In the supervisor training program emphasis was placed on service to the smaller industries, Williams said. "This effort resulted in an increase of 52 per cent in the number of companies served and 100 per cent increase in the number of towns represented in classes as compared with 1951-52. A total of 165 classes were held with 244 towns represented and an enrollment of 2,540.

Seventy-one classes in water plant operation and maintenance, sewage plant operation and maintenance, water meter repair and maintenance (annual schools) were held. Six hundred thirty towns were represented with an enrollment of 2,107.

In the automobile and repair department of the production and distribution of instructional material, a study guide was developed for part-time vocational students. There were 30 assignments complete with answers. This is the first unit of a series of several groups of assignments in this field, Williams says. "These were produced by one of the men in the vocational industrial teacher training service."

In the electrical industry there are 723 apprentices in Texas using manuals prepared by this service, 43 classes were operated with 21 towns represented. Nine states are using the instructional material, with 14 towns outside of Texas using the material, 22 out-of-state classes and 400 out-of-state apprentices using the material.

New Programs Are Promoted
New programs promoted include classes in blue-print reading for journeymen operated by Houston and Dallas; two classes for maintenance journeymen and apprentices operated by Freeport. Houston operated a class for apprentice maintenance electricians.

Three colleges in Texas are using manuals for gasoline plant operation for evening classes; six public schools are using the manuals with employes from 16 plants attending the classes; three plants are operating plant classes. Four hundred persons enrolled while 700 out-of-state persons, enrolled.

Five colleges, one public school, five refineries with an enrollment of 700 in Texas used the manual on petroleum refining, while 2,800 out-of-state persons used the manuals.

Nine hundred and eighty-seven apprentices used the instructional materials, 44 apprentice classes were held with 22 cities represented. New apprentice programs were installed at Texarkana, Wichita Falls, and Harlingen.

Classes Are Large
Forty classes in water plant operations and maintenance were held with 239 towns represented with a total enrollment of 786; twelve sewage plant operations and maintenance classes were held, 81 towns represented with an enrollment of 359; two water repair classes were held in seven towns with an enrollment of 21; two classes (annual schools) were held
