CAMPUS CLEANERS

An Editorial Prof Hospitality

The number of students who signed up for Prof Hospitality night fell a good bit short of the total invited. A total of 122 faculty and staff members opened their homes to about 1,000 students, but not more than half of the maximum potential was attained.

There are several possible reasons for the failure of students to participate with the same enthusiasm with which the profs made the invitation.

Some students apparently can't shake the feeling that to accept such an invitation would be interpreted by fellow students as an attempt to "get next to the prof." Those who fit in this category could easily overcome that difficulty by signing to visit profs who have impressed the student with their friendly attitude, but who are not instructors to the student in any of his classes.

For those students who would argue, "But all my friends don't know who my class profs are," there is no hope. They might as well remain introverts.

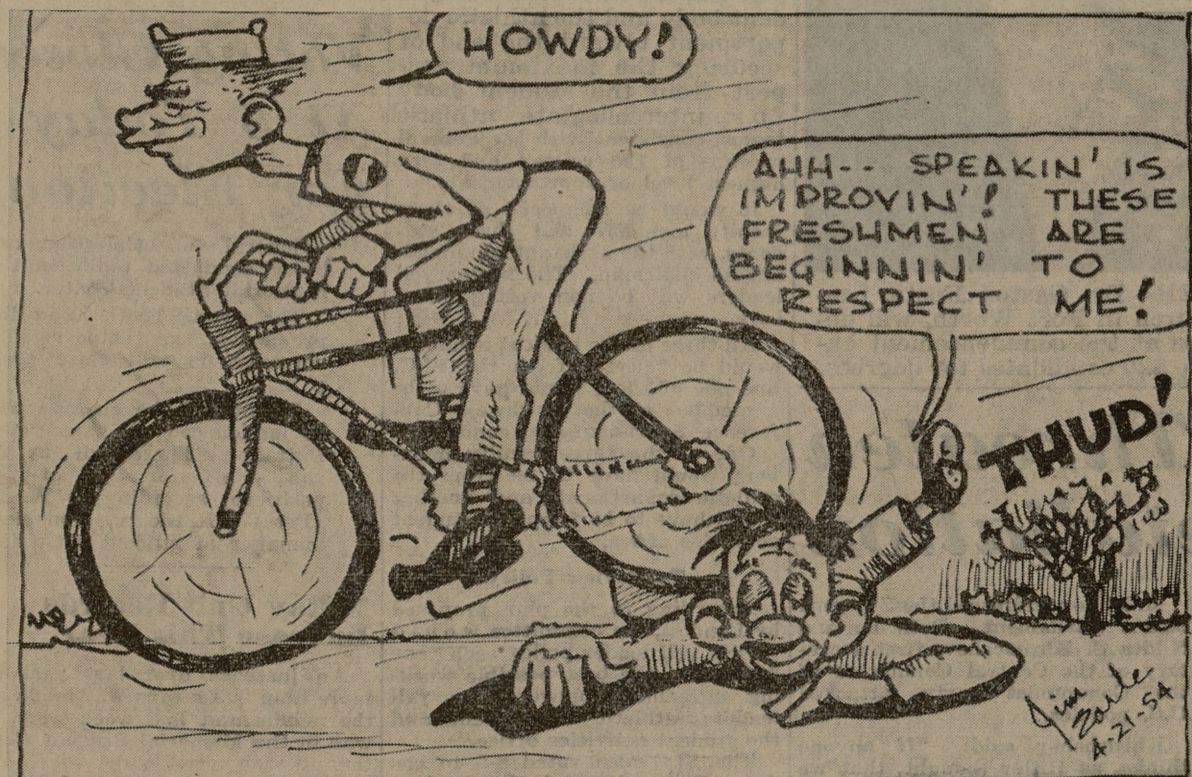

The most plausible explanation for the poor student turnout was the inability of large numbers to sign within a short period.

With 122 invitation blanks attached to four clip boards, students had to stand around while someone else thumbed through the alphabetically arranged lists to locate a particular prof. If his name wasn't even there, the student began a search for a second choice prof, while the waiters grew impatient.

Next time the bottlenecks will be eliminated.
