Texas, while not taking any concrete action as a state, has at least developed a waitand-see attitude that is better than horsemounting.

But the young people of the Texas colleges have shown that not only are they not hostile to the idea of integration, they favor the proposal.

The Texas Intercollegiate Student association, composed of representatives from about 30 Texas colleges, including A&M, last year formulated a resolution advocating integration, and A&M's Student Senate last week indicated its line of thinking.

The senate approached the question rather obliquely—an item came up on the agenda on whether or not there should be a special section set aside for Negroes in White coliseum for shows like Town Hall. After a little debate, the senate discovered that there already was a coliseum committee, and they had no business recommending any sort of seating plan. But in the debate the question of white and Negro was pretty thoroughly
