Heaving Theories Proven Recently

Generally accepted theories on heaving clays were borne out in soil mechanics research by the Texas Engineering Experiment Station involving the soils beneath and adjacent to two old buildings on the A&M campus.

Razing of the buildings provided opportunities for borings to be made. One of the buildings, Foster Hall, had been erected in 1898 and the other, Pfeuffer Hall, in 1887.

L. A. Dubose, research worker, believes that following recognized recommendations of soils engineering scientists in construction operations would eliminate many of the problems resulting from expansive clays.

Founding footings to a depth below seasonal moisture fluctuations is considered good practice. The depth should be a function of climatic factors, topography and soil profile. Buildings will then better withstand desiccation of soils by a hot dry season.

Poor drainage from gutters, broken sewers, and leaky water mains are also seen as causes for difficulty with expansive clay soils. They usually cause large movements within a short time. In addition there is the possibility of the soil becoming sufficiently softened by prolonged wetting to cause settlement of a structure.

Accident Prevention

safety is not one individual's problem; it is "your problem and my problem," he said. A safety engineer, or director, is a long-range ideal, he said, but many problems have to be worked out.

Safety will have to be sold to each person—student and employee—at A&M on an individual basis, Hill emphasized.

Another need faced by the Committee is a good accident-reporting system. On this matter, Hill said that the System Committee hopes to have a uniform system set up at its first meeting, which is expected to be held in the next few weeks.

The College Committee deferred action on both the safety engineer recommendation and further action of a reporting system until after the System Committee meets.

Members of the College Accident Prevention Committee are Herman B. Segrest, chairman; W. B. Brazeale, Dr. G. S. Trevino, Raymond L. Rogers, Maj. Charles M. Taylor, L. P. Cobble, F. D. Nixon, B. F. K. Mullins, Dr. A. F. Isbell, Herbert W. Whitney and Bill Fullerton.
