by the federal government. "We have not yet in America," Thomas said, "proved that we can provide a high level of prosperity without a large expenditure of federal funds on arms." And he wondered, and made us wonder, about the outcome of this arms race. And in view of problems like those now confronting us in the Middle and the Far East, "Can it go on and not be used?" he asked. "Will a balance of terror keep peace in the world?"

And what would be the outcome, he asked, if we had real peace in the world, and the funds now spent on arms could be turned to furthering education and health?

A lot of questions he asked us. And a lot of unanswered hopes and misgivings in us he brought to the surface. A lot of problems that will, if they ever are, be resolved only by possessing such a faith as this great man spoke of.

And for the present generation, to whom the problem is being left, what did Thomas offer? The best thing was a belief and faith such as his—and the following statement:

"Rich as you (our generation) are and great as you may be in many respects, I think that probably your generation is the poorer because you have less hope than we had."

Thomas was talking about a formerly believed faith in man's progress, a faith that mankind was on a ramp that pointed upward and onward and that the "heavenly city of peace and good will among men" was not so far off.

We have not taken the interest that we should. We are, as the speaker asked if we were, "with all of our education and all of our skill content to admit that we rush to our own destruction." We admit it, not as a "fact," but in our actions.

As I left the ballroom with the others, I was turning over in my mind the faith that we need—"a faith in the possibility of mankind's progress without a belief in its inevitability," for such leads only to an indifference that is only too apparent. And I wondered also how I was going to write about this talk, and about this man. Finally, I decided to present the speech as it entered my mind, not as it left Norman Thomas' lips. It's not exactly typical, or even good, journalism; but objective facts cannot always accomplish journalism's purpose of communicating to readers. And faith is a hard thing to write objectively about.

It was a great evening with a great man.

J. Paul Sheedy* Had A Hangdog Look Till Wildroot Cream-Oil Gave Him Confidence

Poor old mangy Sheedy was hounded by a lack of confidence! Every girl he talked to told him he was barking up the wrong tree. "Fido don't get a date pretty soon," he howled, "I'm gonna flea the campus and go home to mutter." Then he got wise to Wildroot Cream-Oil. Now he has confidence in any situation because he nose his hair looks healthy and handsome, the way Nature intended... neat but not greasy. Contains the heart of Lanolin, the very best part of Nature's finest hair and scalp conditioner. Get yourself a bottle or tube of Wildroot Cream-Oil, America's biggest selling hair tonic. It gives you the confidence you need to be a gay dog.
