

So They Say . . .

According to educators, the busy student is supposed to get more than just "book learning" from his stay at college.

At college, they say, he is given the chance to develop and to begin reaping the products of his trained mind, both academically and in the field of student government and activities.

Through various student organizations, they say, he is given the chance to even help develop and enrich his school. He is to be treated as a maturing man whose ideas should be seriously considered.

Yet too many of these great aims are merely served through lip service and not actual practice. He has the privilege and the freedom to express them but little attention is given him.

A prime example of this is the opposition met by Arts & Sciences Council in their recommendations to the executive committee of the School of Arts & Sciences.

Of the 14 proposals offered, experience of the educators showed the Council members most of their ideas could not effectively be put in operation.

But there was one suggestion that found no real resistance except disagreement.

This was the idea of offering a one-hour typing course here.

Chief argument against this idea was that it was not higher education and that if a student really wanted to type, he could teach himself.

Is it any wonder student leaders often become discouraged and cynically disregard the false sounds of "we want your ideas and suggestions?"

Quizzes In Store For New Students

A&M will embark on an all-out freshman testing program this summer for the first time, according to C. H. Ransdell, associate dean of the Basic Division.

These aptitude and achievement tests which are required of all entering students and students transferring less than 30 semester hours college credit will be offered at various times during the summer.

On July 27 the tests will be given at Pan American College in Edinburg for students who live in the valley region. They will also be given in Big Spring Aug. 10th for students of the Panhandle area.

"This is an effort to extend our services to the student," Ransdell said.

The tests will be given on Saturdays from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

"The results of these tests serve to help the student know more about himself, to assist him in evaluating areas of strength and weakness, to aid student and staff relative to academic placement in courses and to afford bases for
