A volcano spewing steam amid a background of floating icebergs and swimming penguins vividly stands out as one of the highlights of a trip to the bottom of the world by a young Texas meteorologist.

"Trees sure look good after seeing little but icy wastelands, penguins and seals for weeks", Guy A. Franceschini, associate professor of the Oceanography and Meteorology Department, said on his return from a two-month excursion that took him to the Antarctic continent.

He went along as an observer for the U.S. Navy aboard an Argentine icebreaker on an International Geophysical Year expedition. He was one of two American meteorologists on the voyage aboard the "General San Martin", commanded by Capt. Louis Capurro. Base of operations for the expedition was Ushuaia, Argentina, the southern-most city in the world.

In addition to completing a radio-telephone call to his wife in Bryan on her birthday, other highlights of the trip included a reunion with an Aggie on Antarctica, and eating bacon and penguin eggs for breakfast and seal steak for dinner.

The group left Ushuaia on about Jan. 1, went through the South Shetland, South Orkney, and South Sandwich, Islands, and on to an Argentine base on the Antarctic continent. It was on the northernmost island of the South Sandwich that they saw the steaming volcano, which was such a contrast to its surroundings.

From the Argentine base, Franceschini went 150 miles by air to the American base of Ellsworth, where he met one of his former meteorology students, Doyle Urban, a 1957 A&M graduate from Rockdale. Urban will be there with a group of scientists until about this time next year.

While at the American base, Franceschini got to talk to his wife in Bryan, thanks to a radio operator at the base and an amateur radio operator in Houston. The "ham" operator made a long distance telephone call to Mrs. Franceschini in Bryan and then placed the phone and the radio side by side. Franceschini said the connection was perfect.

He said penguin eggs go very well with bacon and taste about like the eggs here. He described seal steaks as dark but rich and good.

In addition to the scientific purposes of the expedition, new personnel and supplies were taken to the icy continent and last year's crew was returned.

Although principally an observer, Franceschini took water temperature measurements through the Drake Passage to determine limits of the Antarctic convergence zone, and took temperature measurements at various depths in the snow on the continent in the interest of micrometeorology.

The meteorologist said, "it was a wonderful experience but I'm glad to be home".
