Ranchers Learn About Conservation

For the future rancher, A&M's range management course offers a teaching program emphasizing fundamental and associate problems on ranch and livestock management from the standpoint of conservation, proper land usage and maximum livestock production.

The bachelor of science degree offered in range management prepares a student for jobs with federal and state agencies, private industries and range operations. Department officials estimate that five jobs are available for each range management graduate.

Range management comes under the Department of Range and Forestry, which also offers a two-year course of study in forestry, with provision for funds to help pay for a final degree in forestry in an accredited out-of-state school.

Ag Teachers Find Training Planned Here

Students interested in teaching vocational agriculture can find a home in the Department of Agricultural Education where every step of their career is planned and supervised by staff members.

Training is basically concerned with teaching vo-ag students how to work successfully with farm adults and youth as well. Certain technical information plus the correct methods of instructing are necessary for an agriculture teacher. These things they learn as well as developing their leadership ability.

In the department students are given opportunity to join collegiate FFA work and to help analyze and solve problems that arise in rural areas.

Some problems require research before the solution is apparent. Techniques of doing such are also emphasized.

As a final step, the department helps graduates find good positions after completing classroom work.

Plant Study, Beauty Part of Agriculture

Opportunities for employment as floriculturists and landscape architects exist in teaching, extension and research.

Floriculture is the branch of agriculture concerned with the production, distribution and marketing of ornamental plants. The curriculum is designed to provide preparation for the highly technical and specialized growing operations for florist and nursery crop production.

Ag Engineering Plays Big Role In Two Fields

Modern mechanized farming, along with the wide-spread use of irrigation and the increasing need for soil conservation, makes the role of the agricultural engineer greater than ever before.

The agricultural engineer is trained in both fields. His experience in integrating the two qualifies him to design, develop, organize and direct engineering work in agriculture and closely allied fields.

The four major phases covered in agricultural engineering are farm power and machinery, farm buildings and structures, farm electrification and soil and water conservation.

Graduates in agricultural engineering are prepared for service with colleges and the government in teaching, extension and research work; with government soil erosion and control projects; manufacturers of farm machinery; advertising sales and design work; and engineering and soil erosion and control, irrigation and drainage work.
