

Nehru Finds Neutralist Tough Spot to Maintain

By J. M. ROBERTS

Associated Press News Analyst

As the years go by Prime Minister Nehru of India finds the lot of the neutralist more and more difficult.

A decade ago Nehru accepted the idea that he and India had to get along with Red China.

He also had the idea that he might ride out the current world conflict and one day emerge as leader not only of an India which had escaped the worst threats of cold war and possibly hot war, but also of a reviving Asia.

One idea was forced on him by Red China's growing power, the other by his own philosophy.

Acting in a character touched by time spent in British jails, having seen and fought Western imperialism, he took with a grain of salt the charges that international communism designed a new imperialism. He philosophically decided to let time develop the evidence on that score.

Nehru's philosophy has been condoned by the West, which has gone right ahead trying to help India solve her tremendous problems.

Now he learns the bread isn't buttered on both sides. With their great knack for displaying their clay feet, the Peiping Reds have now turned on him in fury.

The people of India have cultural ties and great sympathy for the Tibetans. Their natural impulse is to go to the aid of the battling patriots of the isolated Himalayan state. Barred from that by circumstance, they would like to offer moral support from which Nehru's diplomacy backs away.

He was embarrassed by the suggestion that the Dalai Lama, if he is alive and could escape, might ask sanctuary in India, which could be granted only against a stern of Communist protest.

Exchanges between Peiping and New Delhi already are becoming bitter because of Red charges that India has provided a base for the Tibetan revolt.

Nehru thus finds himself out of time with the West, out of tune with the Communists, and for this one time separated from his own people by what he thinks are the necessities of diplomacy.

A breakfast will be held in the MSC at 8:30 a.m. for incoming and outgoing presidents and secretaries of the Rotary Club.

Purpose of the conference, according to Russell Hillier, president of the Bryan-College Station Rotary Club, is to review the service work of the Rotary Clubs in the district and to plan ways of increasing the effectiveness of their future activities.
