T. L. McLaughlin Conducts Research

Thomas L. McLaughlin, A&M student from Bryan, is engaged in original research on anaplasmosis, a blood destroying disease of cattle.

Under the direction of Dr. T. E. Franklin, associate professor in veterinary medicine, McLaughlin is studying the microscopic organism "anaplasma marginale," the causative agent of anaplasmosis.

The research is chiefly concerned with an attempt to study blood cells passing from a living infected calf into a special chamber where time-lapse-phase photomicrographs will be made of the disease-causing organism.

Through his technique, which is new to science, it will be possible, it is pointed out, to study blood cells in the process of becoming infected with the microorganism. In addition, the results of this work will, for the first time, expose the life cycle and basic morphology of the organism, it is declared.
