What has happened to dead week?

This question is currently foremost in the minds of students on the Texas A&M campus. With less than a week until final exams begin, virtually all students find themselves faced with a battery of major exams.

It appears to leave an atmosphere of 'education in a hurry.

The last of the hour quizzes are hardly completed before final exams open. This situation is especially true for students in the ROTC program who have a final exam scheduled Saturday morning.

When does a student have time to efficiently review a course in preparation for a final exam, especially if he has to crowd a semester's review into one weekend? Compound that problem if a student has two final exams scheduled Monday, or if most of them fall early in the week.

It goes without saying that a student cannot put forth his best effort; he cannot effectively absorb all he is exposed to in a semester.

Texas A&M students are forced to enter most finals with the attitude "we can still go to college on hereditary knowledge" full in their minds.

Ah, but dead week on the Texas A&M campus is dead. Still, we maintain that a dead week is incidental to successful and comprehensive completion of college work.

Visibly Lacking

If the number of letters-to-the-editor received in the office of a college newspaper is any indication of student, administration or faculty interest in the workings of the college, then interest in the workings of Texas A&M is visibly lacking.

So far this year the greatest number of letters received on any subject on any day has been five. Out of a student body of 7,200, three students had enough interest to write letters that day about the proposed name change. The other two letters that day were written by former students. At other colleges, the students have to be told editorially to cease sending letters on controversial subjects because of the overwhelming volume of letters received. Here, we are asking

Students aren't the only people on campus who should have a voice in campus affairs. Complaints are often heard from faculty members because they aren't receiving the attention to which they think they are entitled. And yet, not one single faculty member has bothered to send a letter to the student newspaper on any subject since the start of the ment for personal services renfall semester.

As far as the administration's voice in campus affairs is concerned, it is handled through news releases or other, erty must have occurred at the impersonal methods of communication. In this way seldom does the individual student feel any kinship with the administration. Perhaps this method, resulting in the student body feeling not a part, but a subject, of the administration; is the reason for the lack of letters from students.

The whole problem boils down to one of communication. Perhaps if there is a free interplay of information, using the letters-to-the-editor column as one channel of communication, much of the misunderstanding and suspicion that exists on the campus can be eliminated.
