The Hebrew-Christian view, long before Marx, was a prophetic religion crying out against social wrong and exploitation and love of money and racial hatred.

"Marx affirmed the reality of history and the urgency and importance of time. In fact in this philosophical sense Marxism is a perversion of the Hebrew-Christian philosophy which has been called by William Temple the most materialistic of all religions.

"The Hebrew-Christian view contends that this world is and should be conquered for the glory of God and the betterment of man. Any beyond all of this the Hebrew-Christian view has virtues which Marxism does not have. It sees that there are more sins than greed and that the destruction of private property will not bring a Utopia.

"It has appreciation for the individual person and seeks to redeem him.

"It tells of the possibility of personal immortality.

"It creates within the hearts of individuals and within communities that which is known as agape love which is a sacrificial, caring and unselfish love.

"The Hebrew-Christian view agrees with the optimistic view that there is a possibility of progress. It encourages and undergirds scientific progress. But it also affirms that along with scientific progress must come a renewed will, personal power and an ultimate goal. It realizes that although a superman may build an airplane an apeman can utilize it.

"Consciously or unconsciously you have found or formulated a frame of orientation and an object of devotion for your life. There is no such thing as neutrality.

"Surely the most basic question of life is which philosophy, which religion, which world-view is the most comprehensive and realistic and all-inclusive.

"It is the glory of our American tradition that you will not be forced to agree with me—or with any other speaker you might have.

"But let me remind you," Newport declared, "that in these revolutionary times if you are to make any serious contribution, if you are to have personal victory and hope, you must decide—and act—on the highest insight you can find or know."
