Astronomy In Southern Hemisphere To Be Viewed

Dr. Hugh H. Johnson, a noted astronomer, will lecture tonight at 8 p.m. in Room 113 of the Biological Sciences Building.

The young scientist is presently working with the National Astronomical Observatory of the University of Arizona and will speak on "Astronomy in the Southern Hemisphere."

Johnson will also be available for conferences with students interested in astronomy, space travel and astrophysics. Interested students should arrange at the Placement Office for an appointment with Johnson.

He will deliver several lectures while on the campus. This morning at 10 a.m. he spoke on "Interstellar Matter," at 4 p.m. he spoke on "The Star Cluster and The Orion Nebula," and tomorrow at 11 a.m. he will speak on "The Magellanic Clouds."

Johnson received his AB Degree, his BS Degree and his PhD from the University of Chicago, and was a research assistant at Yerkes Observatory from 1950-53, when he was made research associate of the Observatory. He was assistant professor, State University of Iowa from 1954-59.

Johnson was a visiting fellow with the Australian National University and the Mount Stromlo Observatory from 1958-59. He became Associate Professor and Associate Astronomer with the University of Arizona in 1960.
