Crume Cracks King-Sized Oyster Shell

By The Associated Press
Texas is a king-sized oyster and the shell cracks easily under Paul Crume's skillful probing.

And crack the shell he has in his "A Texan at Bay" published by McGraw-Hill and just recently on the bookstore shelves.

Crume, columnist for the Dallas Morning News, has opened a Texas shell of memories to dig at some choice tidbits of his early days in West Texas, chides sometimes not so gently at the good old days and modern Texas, pokes fun at his own newspaper profession and talks with nostalgia about the demise of the windmill.

The rodeo — for instance — is not all the glamor it has been proclaimed. Crume contends it came "from the boredom of Texas cowboy Sunday afternoons" and despite the common belief is "no more Mexican than chop suey is Chinese. It is no more Mexican than Texas chili, that highly-flavored meat soup which developed in the greasy-spoon restaurants of Texas."

In his slightly sardonic and often irreverent approach to Texas, Crume has come up with a successful product. "A Texan At Bay" is enjoying good sales even if he does contend that a lot of Texas fortunes start with a little skill with dice and that the true Texan always understates things. If you don't believe it, "take a look at the figure he gave for his income on his last return," he says.

Crume's book has received enthusiastic reviews in newspapers over the state. Out in the South Plains country — an area about which Crume writes so expertly — Jack Sheridan of the Lubbock Avalanche-Journal said he "got hysterical" over "A Texan at Bay."

"You don't have to be a Texan to appreciate it," Sheridan added in his review. "It's a pretty good bet there's a belt of laughter already building from coast to coast."

'Everybody Says Bonuses Are Bad'

By HAROLD V. RATLIFF
Associated Press Sports Writer

The major leagues are paying out bonuses due to total $9,000,000 for high school boys and collegians and everybody in baseball says it's bad and ought to be stopped.

That's the way it is every year but nobody does anything about stopping it. Baseball is like that. The majors virtually ruined the minor leagues with their television and said they sure hated to see the minors fade out. Because then they wouldn't be able to get developed players. But they are getting millions of dollars for the broadcasts, so they just went right on doing them.

Few minor leagues are left and those that are functioning are losing money. The Texas League made two shifts with half the season not finished in order to stay afloat.

The baseball men say it's bad to pay a high school boy, who isn't likely to be able to stick in even the high minors, $100,000 bonus. It's costing a lot of money and the results are poor.

On the part of professional baseball it is a bad practice. However, based on the way baseball operates, it is no more than just. Baseball signs boys just out of high school and boys who are only freshmen in college. Those boys are giving up an education for baseball and they deserve to be paid a sum that a college education would be worth. It is only reasonable to believe that an education would be worth $100,000.

If baseball had the same rules as pro football there would be none of the gigantic bonuses. Pro football will not sign a boy until his class has graduated in college, then it's by draft.

Pro baseball, however, refuses to follow such a line. Under its rules a high school boy can't be signed until he has finished his eligibility but the collegians are free game for the pro baseball scouts. The only stipulation is that a collegian won't be signed during the current college year, unless he's over 21 years of age. Then he can be signed anytime.

Actually, baseball is pretty strict regarding high school boys, which is commendable. A boy still in high school can not be signed unless his high school eligibility has expired. Even then he is not obligated to report for baseball service until the class with which he originally entered high school has graduated (in other words, eight semesters after his original entry in the ninth grade).

A student who drops out of high school prior to expiration of his athletic eligibility and continues to remain out for at least one year may be signed to a contract but if any baseball man is found to have influenced such withdrawal that man is penalized.

Pro Scouts can talk to high school students about baseball contracts at any time and they can conduct tryouts during the summer vacation. But during the school year the school officials must agree to it for the boys to be given tryouts.

Pro baseball can not pay the boy anything in the tryout camp. It can't even pay his travel expense or enter into an agreement with him for future services. Of course, proving that the expenses were paid or if the boy reached an agreement on a contract would be quite difficult.
