Report Says Average Student Financed Mostly By Parents

Special to THE BATTALION
The $2,500 the average college student spends each year is accumulated from many sources, according to an article in College and University Business, the magazine of business administration in higher education.

Reporting on a recent survey conducted at Bates College (Lewiston, Maine), the article states that parents provide funds for 64 per cent of the annual bill. Students obtain the other 36 per cent from loans, scholarships and their own earnings.

From their own savings, 198 students drew an average of $485, while 207 reported financial support averaging $623 in the form of scholarship aid. Loans taken by 109 students averaged $760.

The statistical average naturally encompass all extremes. For example, of the 658 students responding to the survey, 36 stated that they received no assistance from their parents, while on the other hand a slightly greater number reported full parental support.

The bulk of the individual student's annual expenses goes to the college. At Bates, the combined costs of tuition, room and board, and fees amounted to $2,015. On the average, the students spent $117 for clothes, $70 for textbooks, and $115 for recreation.

Seniors, as might be expected, spent somewhat more than the underclassmen, with freshmen, sophomores, and juniors showing higher expense totals with each year's advance.

Women, surprisingly enough, reported spending more than men by just a shade over two dollars. Again, this is an average figure. Both the highest and lowest amounts spent were reported by men.

made by the reactor is in the field of cotton growing. Systemic insecticides, introduced into the plant itself, were enthusiastically hailed a few years ago by cotton growers. Designed to prevent boll weevil damage, they have not done the job expected.

To determine the movements of insecticides in cotton plants and the amounts reaching the squares and other vital areas, the insecticides are "labeled" with radioactive phosphorus.

Dr. Joe Haskayol and his associate in the Plant Physiology and Pathology Department have used these isotopes to tell just how much of a systemic insecticide actually reaches the cotton square, where it is needed.

The Nuclear Science Center was built at a cost of over one million dollars. Most of this was paid for by the state. In addition, the U. S. Atomic Energy Commission furnished $29,000 for the purchase of the fuel elements and the start-up procedure.
