Student Body Called On What Will Be The Result?

The Student Senate is planning to meet tonight in Room 3-D of the Memorial Student Center. If student interest is anything like it should be, the meeting should have to be adjourned to G. Rollie White Coliseum.

Student Body President Sheldon Best, who heads the senate, has invited all students to the meeting for a discussion of the present name-change question. Best's motives are all that anyone could ask—to find out how the student body feels about the issue. The rest is up to the students: if no one shows up, the eventual decision of the Senate could be contradictory to the real feeling of the student body.

Various other ways to measure student opinion have been tried here in the past, and none have ever really worked. The latest effort was an administration-asked election held last spring. Many observers were surprised to see the student vote favor a name-change, admission of coeds and the abolition of a compulsory Corps of Cadets. But more revealing was the fact that only 48.2 per cent of the student body vote—and this was a record turnout.

Of course a 48 per cent student turnout tonight would be much more phenominal, but we see no reason why each student's views can't be expressed by at least a dormitory representative. Probably the most feasible method of handling tonight's "opinion pool" would be through quick elections in dormitories, with a representative then voicing the resulting decision at the senate meeting.

to star in the account was William G. Adams, a physics major from Dallas. He was picked because he was so gung-ho and because of his evident "undying love" for A&M.

Fish Adams, along with his ol' lady, Don Smith, an eco major from Dallas, were good subjects for writer Paul Rosenfield and photographer Andy Hanson.

The young Ags were followed from first call to lights out. The newspapermen tagged after them from the dorm to class, to the

At last Rosenfield and Hanson said they had enough poop, and returned to Dallas to write their story. The article, with a lot of pictures, was to go in The Times Herald's Sunday magazine supplement. Sounds good does-

But this week Doyle Gougler, a writer in the College Information Office, received a letter from reporter Rosenfield. The sad news was — he wrote — that the star of the story, Fish Adams had gone AWOL to the University of Texas at mid-term, before it had been published.

But the story has a happy ending. The Dallas newspapermen reworked their story around Fish Smith, who is still here, and the feature is to appear Sunday,
