Seagoing Aggies Sail From Emerald Isle With High Tide

A&M's seagoing cadets have sailed with the high tide from Ireland and are headed for the Port of Bremen in Germany.

That's the word from Capt. Bennett M. Dodson, superintendent of the Texas Maritime Academy, who spent 14 days at sea with the Aggies.

Dodson left the ship in Dublin and returned (by airplane) to College Station to map plans for another school year for the budding maritime officers.

THEY WILL MOVE from the main campus here to the new TMA headquarters on Galveston Island at historic old Fort Crockett. The academy is now one-year-old.

Dodson, a retired U. S. Navy captain, had nothing but praise for the 20 Texas cadets during the first lap of a summer cruise.

"I am pleased to report that the cadets are in fine spirits and in splendid standing with officers of Empire State ship," he said on his arrival here.

The Texans are actually "guests" of the New York Maritime College. They are aboard a former Navy transport, which the New Yorkers now call the "Empire State IV."

As "guests" however, the Texans scrub decks, scramble for boat lowering drills and assist with other seafaring chores during the 12-weeks at sea.

BEFORE THE ship departed New York, training had started. For five days, the students from both maritime schools participated in boat drills.

"It was the first time some of the Texas lads had ever had an oar in their hands," Dodson said with a grin.

A week later, the ship moved out Long Island Sound into the Atlantic for "some extra drills and sea trials." After 24-hours at sea, the ship re-entered New York harbor and proceeded up the Hudson River past West Point to Albany.

Following receptions there, the cadets headed for the Atlantic. The first two nights were slightly rainy but weather and sea were smooth. No seasickness was reported.

During the next week, 44 boat lowerings were made, Dodson recalled. The boats were lowered to the water while the ship continued at slow speed. The rowers had to keep pace.

FINALLY, AFTER 14 days of smooth sailing, the ship entered the Irish Sea and proceeded to Dublin, where President Kennedy had stirred the Irishmen a few days before.

Aggies In Port
