WHEN SCHOOL BEGINS

Junior Engineers Launch 8th Year

The Junior Engineer's Technical Society — JETS — will launch its eighth year in Texas when school bells ring this September.

Fifty-nine chapters from the Texas Panhandle to the Rio Grande Valley from the Piney Woods to the Plains will get into full swing with the opening of Texas classrooms for the fall school term. Designed to acquaint high school students with the nature of engineering and science, the Texas Society has its headquarters at A&M.

Texas JETS is sponsored by the Texas Society of Professional Engineers. Professional engineers in local cities serve as advisors to JETS chapters across the state.

Texas JETS is for the benefit of the students in Texas schools. Each chapter is autonomous and responsible only to the local school's regulations. National and state headquarters offer informational materials, recommend speakers, sponsor state and regional conferences and contests and publish newsletters and a journal.

ACCORDING TO J. G. McGuire, assistant dean of engineering here and director of JETS in Texas, the organization has for its main purpose the stimulation of high school students to make a greater effort in their school work, particularly with reference to study of mathematics, science and English. "We have evidence to support our belief that JETS is fulfilling its mission. Students and parents both have indicated their appreciation for the opportunity of receiving guidance and inspiration from a practicing engineer" McGuire said.

This fall, Texas youths will be encouraged by their local JETS chapters to get back to the serious study of mathematics, science and English. But JETS will try to put some fun into the study. Aided by the state headquarters, local chapters, will sponsor field trips, group discussions, lectures, science and engineering project development, and the writing of technical papers.

THE SOCIETY will see to it that JETS are rewarded for their efforts with scholarships. Two or more scholarships are awarded each year. One is the $250 A&M Former Student Association JETS Scholarship for study of engineering or a physical science at A&M. Another is the $250 Gramercy JETS Scholarship given for the study of engineering here.
