SWC Gag Rule Reviewed; 'Speak No Evil'

By HAROLD V. RATLIFF
Associated Press Sports Writer
In 1949 the Southwest Conference adopted a rule that reads: "All criticism in Southwest Conference athletic events should be submitted in writing to the executive secretary and not be communicated to the press by coaches or other representatives of member schools."

It was passed following some tough criticism of the officiating in the Arkansas-Texas Christian football game.
THE SPORTS writers immediately labeled it the gag rule. The conference never has liked that designation but since it can't gag the sports writers—which it obviously would like to do—it can't do anything about it.

It can keep the news from the press, however, and that's what it did at its winter meeting when it discussed criticism of the officials by the coaches, then refused to announce what action, if any, was taken.

AT LEAST, it is assumed there was a discussion because there had been some public criticism of the officials, notably by Coach Hank Foldberg of Texas A&M, and the conference surely didn't let violation of one of its rules slip by without a least talking it.
It had taken action in two instances of the past, putting Southern Methodist on probation in one and reprimanding Coach Frank Broyles of Arkansas in the other.

The gag rule is nothing but throttling free speech, something which the conference officials certainly have and for which they would fight to retain.
NO OTHER conference in the country has such a rule. The other conferences get along just as well, if not better, without it.
The view of the press is that if the coaches are permitted to speak their minds about the officiating, it will improve the officiating.
In other words, if the official knows he's not going to be publicly taken to task he's not inclined to work as hard.
